Giordano Bruno was burned alive by order of the Holy Inquisition for obstinate heresy, on the 17th of February, 1,600, in the Campo de Flori (Field of Flowers), at Rome. On the 9th of June, 1889, the Liberals of the civilized world united in erecting his statue, in noble form, over the place of his execution, amid the unbounded enthusiasm of some 30,000 spectators, the joy of every lover of liberty on the planet, and the dismay of its enemies.

Con—Posthumous Justice! We have lived to see How unforgetting thou canst sometimes be;
How strangely patient thou canst
Wrong confront
Lyc—And bring thy worthy heroes to the front,
Wrenching their names from time-beclouding fate
To share the glory of the truly great.

Rome had a dark transaction years ago
(Almost three hundred—less ten years, or so),
When in her Field of Flowers, by orders dire,
Great Giordano Bruno died by fire;
The "Holy Inquisition" did decree,
For heresy, he burned alive should be.

What heresies? The infinity of space;
More worlds than this, which is our dwelling-place;
The earth's rotation, to its orbit true.
These were his heresies—old truths to you!
His rankest heresy was nothing worse
Than this: "Our earth is not the universe!"

Christians! in cool, premeditating mood
You murdered one who longed to do you good!
Creed-mad tormentors! Though you tore his tongue
With pincers, still to spotless Truth he clung.
Clad in her valor he went to die,
He met his fate without a moan or cry.
You dreamed at last fire and death had ended all;
That Bruno slept beneath oblivion's pall,
You even dared his cruel fate deny,
And crown your hatred with a coward lie
As dark years veiled it. But, alack, in vain!
The ages have writ out the record plain!

Shout! Rome held festival this year, in June,
When flowers were bountiful and birds in tune.
The nineteenth century awoke at last
To honor Bruno, martyr of the past.
In Campo de Flori, where he burned,
Lo! a grand monument his greatness earned!

Builded by men of thought of many lands,
A fine rebuke to bigotry it stands;
His noble likeness towering grand and high,
With eyes uplifted toward the infinite sky,
A silent preacher, standing there to say
How surely wrong and darkness flee away.

And Rome was full of souls athrob with light,
Full thirty thousand, rapturous with delight;
One hundred bands of music centered there,
And nineteen hundred banners kissed the air;
Italy's king among the throng appeared,
Saw Bruno's monument, admired and cheered.

O, grand and righteous triumph! come at last!
The age and wisdom Bruno's mind forecast
Are with us! But the Pope—ah! where was he?
Locked in his palace's grim security!
And not a priest was seen that day in Rome;
Shame-hidden they bemoaned such day had come!

THE FRENCH.

IN FRANCE SPIRITUALISM IS MAKING GREAT PROGRESS—M. BOUVERY COMES FORTH WITH A REMARKABLE BOOK.

As set forth by the New York World's correspondence from Paris, France, that country fully appreciates the grand truths of Spiritualism. Says the writer:

These are the days of superstitious credulity in Paris—days when every sound has a supernatural significance and every unusual coincident is regarded with holy awe, when Victorien Sardou contributes to the craze by writing "Spiritisme" for Sarah Bernhardt at the Gymnaise, and that clever artist Caran d'Ache caricatures the whole outfit in the Figaro. Spirits seem to be everywhere, and the risque gossip of the cafes and boulevards has given way to whispered debates on the plurality of existence. Of course the newspapers are full of the theme, and many pamphlets have emanated from charlatans which are eagerly devoured by the over-credulous, and even staid and grave professors of the University have been drawn into the vortex of whirling belief and have contributed in published interviews some unexplained phenomenon of their youth or have ventured their opinions in scientifically worded monographs.

But perhaps the most remarkable book lately published on the subject, which appeals to the scientist as well as the dreamer, is one called "Le Spiritisme et l'Anarchie Devant la Science et la Philosophie" (Spiritualism and Anarchy Facing Science and Philosophy). The author is M. J. Bouvery, the publisher, Chamuel.

The author's scheme is to show us the solution of social problems by an exact knowledge of psychic phenomena. Whether one admits or eschews his theories, one cannot read with indifference the apparently well-authenticated revelations with which his book is filled. For him, Spiritualism, science of the soul, touches the two worlds, terrestrial and extra-terrestrial, of which it is the bond.

After a long argument, in which he may possibly prove by concrete examples that "rien n'est plus naturel que ce que nous croyons surnaturel" (nothing is more natural than that which we believe to be supernatural), he comes to these two striking paragraphs concerning the trinity in human existence, thus accounting in an original and most extraordinary way for the so-called spiritual phenomenon of materialization:

"Man is not a unity; man is a trinity. He is made up of a soul, an evanescent envelope of the soul called the 'perisprit,' and a body. Although the body may dissolve itself into dust and fluids, the two other elements do not change; they remain in existence ready to manifest themselves to the living under certain given conditions.

"Thus the perisprit, owing to its evanescent quality, becomes visible at certain times and under certain influences clothing the spirit in the form, feature and raiment of life. There can be no doubt that these visitations have not been mere optical delusions, for a permanent record of their appearance has been preserved by the photograph."

Near the end of the book M. Bouvery gives the following vouched-for evidence as a proof of the plurality of existence. The testimony comes from an American named Isaac G. Foster, and reads as follows:

"Twelve years ago I was living in Effingham County, Ill. There I lost a daughter named Mary at the age of thirteen years. The following year I moved to Dakota, from which I have not since removed.

"Four years after my arrival there my wife gave birth to another daughter, whom we called Nellie, but who, as soon as she was able to talk, persisted that her name was Mary, saying that it was her 'real' name; and to humor her we called her by it sometimes. A year ago I returned to Effingham County in order to settle some business affairs, and took Nellie with me. She recognized our former home and many persons that she had never seen, but whom our first daughter Mary had known very well. In a part of the town which we had not yet visited was situated the school-house that Mary had attended. Nellie told me its exact location, and gave me a very correct description of the building, and expressed to me the desire to see the place. I took here there. She entered one of the rooms, and, approaching a pupil's desk, laid her hand upon it and said, 'This is my desk.' It was the very desk that had once been occupied by her dead sister.

"One would say that the dead had returned from the tomb, but her mother will not admit it to be thus. She says that God gave her two children and that one he took away again. As to me I dare not offer any explanation."

Who does not recall in reading these lines the marvelous poetry of Victor Hugo's "Le Revenant?" Tout est possible!

STRAWS SHOW WHICH WAY THE WIND BLOWS—WHAT IS THE MATTER WITH THE PULPIT ON THE QUESTION OF THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE BIBLE?—WHAT ARE WE COMING TO?

New York, Feb. 18.—The question of the infallibility of the Bible was the general topic of conversation in religious circles yesterday. Since Rev. Dr. James M. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, at a meeting of the Methodist ministers in the building of the Methodist book concern Monday, advanced the belief that the English version of the Bible was not infallible, he has been the most widely discussed clergyman in the country. Strange to say, he is unanimously supported in this belief by the ministers who so far have talked on the subject. Some of the opinions expressed were as follows:

Bishop John F. Hurst—Dr. Buckley is unquestionably in accord with the advanced thought of the Christian church to-day. No advanced theologian admits to-day that the Bible, as translated into English, is infallible.

Rev. Robert Collyer, Unitarian.—It is true that there are not now as many thinking people as formerly who hold to the old dogma of the church that the Bible is infallible. It has never been claimed that the Bible is infallible, except as a dogma of the church.

Dr. J. H. Rylance, St. Mark's Episcopal Church.—It is absurd to talk of infallibility of an imperfectly translated Bible.

Dr. Lyman Abbott, of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn.—The action of the Methodist ministers in disavowing belief in the infallibility of the Bible as it stands in the English version does not surprise me. It would surprise me to find a single one believing it.

Brother Francis, the philosophy, science, religion and general teachings of Spiritualism are beginning to bear fruit, as is evidenced by the stand so prominent a preacher has taken as Dr. Buckley. Had he given expression to such a conviction but a few years ago he would have been ousted from the church and his editorial position, as a heretic. Verily, the world moves, and the law of evolution is doing its work.

The following from the Indianapolis Journal will also be of interest to your readers. The minister referred to, Rev. G. N. Eldridge, is a personal acquaintance of mine, having been called to his family professionally while he was pastor of the Wayne St. M. E. Church, in Fort Wayne, Ind. Is now located in Anderson, Ind.

SPECIAL TO THE INDIANAPOLIS JOURNAL.

Anderson, Ind., Jan. 29, 1897.—Rev. Chas. Morton, the evangelist, who has been blind for two weeks past as the result of a fall, was divinely healed this evening. Rev. G. N. Eldridge, pastor of the M. E. Church, and his wife, Mrs. Eldridge, and Mr. Morton spent the entire day in fasting and prayer. Late in the evening they were joined by Sister Andrew Finnegan and Sister T. N. Stilwell, and all united in prayer after reading the following passages of the Bible:

Epistle of James, v:14,15,16. Is there any sick among you; let him call for the elders of the church and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sin, they shall be forgiven him. Confess your faults one to another, and pray for one another that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much. I. John, v:14,15. And this is the confidence that we have in Him, that if we ask anything according to His will He heareth us. And if we know that He hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petition that we desired of Him.

Mark, xi:24. Therefore I say unto you, what things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them and ye shall have them.

Dr. Eldridge anointed Mr. Morton with oil, and then, after silent prayer, the healing was claimed and the miracle wrought. Mr. Morton appeared in the M. E. Church to-night and told the story of his healing. The event created intense emotion; and crowds lingered in the church till a late hour.

Rev. Morton's blindness was a peculiar affliction. He had a fall and struck his head, but did not perceive any immediate injury, going on with his work winning souls to Christ. About four days later he complained of pains in the head and suddenly became totally blind, remaining in that condition until tonight.

I do not propose to enter into the discussion of the question of the cause of the restoration of Rev. Morton's sight. Suffice it to say that medical literature abounds with cases of similar restoration without the aid of prayer, and that such cures can be explained upon purely scientific grounds, in obedience to the law of vis medicatrix nature or the inherent power of nature (God) to cure disease. But I simply desire to remark that if these reverend gentlemen can place so much confidence in the "prayer cure," "faith cure," "Christian Science" etc., why do they reject the phenomena of modern Spiritualism, which are unexplainable upon any other hypothesis than that of Spirit return?

A REMARKABLE DOCTOR BOOK

HAS JUST BEEN ISSUED, ENTITLED

THE NATURE CURE

BY PHYSICAL AND MENTAL METHODS.

A BRIDGE FROM THE OLD TO THE NEW; THE DAWN OF A NEW DAY IN MEDICAL PRACTICE. A CLEAR, SHORT-CUT TREATISE ON THE CAUSE AND CURE OF DISEASE.

By MARVIN E. CONGER, M. D.
Assisted by ROSA C. CONGER, M. D.

The title page is suggestive of important changes in the methods of curing the sick and maintaining health.

THE NATURE CURE is divided into twelve chapters, as follows:

First—Introductory.
Second—Cause of Disease.
Third—Food and Drink.
Fourth—Exercise.
Fifth—Fevers; Cause and Treatment.
Sixth—Disease Inflammatory.
Seventh—Epidemic and Chronic Disease.
Eighth—Baths.
Ninth—Women and Children. (By Rosa C. Conger, M. D.)
Tenth—Useful Recipes.
Eleventh—Object Lessons and Tables.
Twelfth—Miscellaneous Health Suggestions.

Read their definition of medicine: "Any method or remedy that will remove or modify pain without injury, and restore the sick to a normal condition is practical medicine."

The new and better methods of curing the sick and preventing disease, have never been so clearly stated in plain English, for the plain people, as in NATURE CURE.

It is claimed for this book that it is the most complete doctor book ever published, and sold at the lowest price. It is claimed that disease is not a technical, mysterious, theoretical condition or subject, but only a fact that all may understand. More experience, study and time have been expended to evade and pervert the truth, and deceive the people for obtaining money, than to teach the truth and save life and health. THE NATURE CURE reaches the case of this important subject.

The book has 370 pages, is strongly and handsomely bound in cloth for $2.00, and will be mailed upon receipt of price.

Most Ornamental Window or Garden Plant Known, and a Delicious Fruit.

Treated like a Tomato it grows and fruits freely in the garden during summer, or in pots both summer and winter. It bears continually numerous large, inflated husks, much the shape of Chinese Lanterns, at first a beautiful green color, changing to a yellowish hue, then to brightest scarlet, and as they hang suspended among the foliage they present a most novel and beautiful sight. Autumn frosts do not injure it, and it is a showy garden plant until December. In each "Lantern" a fruit is borne, of large size and rich ruby color, which is most delicious for eating raw, or for cooking and preserving. Branches of Lanterns cut and dried retain their rich and brilliant colors for years and make most charming vase ornaments. Grows 18 inches high; bears abundantly all the time in any soil or climate. NEW BOOKS.

Ancient Civilizations. By George Shelly Hughs, DesMoines, Iowa. Published by the author. M,DCCC,XCVI.

This is an original book, written and printed by an original man, and in an original style. This volume can hardly be called a book, it is a library. There are few if any books out of which one can gather so much profound knowledge, especially on the development, rise and fall of nations and of civilizations.

While Mr. Hughs and his book do not assert or insinuate that a collegiate or university education does not properly educate one who passes through its curriculum, he proves beyond a question that our colleges are not necessary to an integral education. As a boy, the author of this volume spent less than two years in an Alabama country school, and then went into that school which has in the last three centuries graduated more great men than any other, that is, the printing office.

After nearly forty years' work as a typesetter, during which time he devoured all the books he could get his hands on, he gives us this book, which is, if not the best, at least among the best books of the century. Every page gives evidence of extensive research and of deep thought.

If this book was written for the million, the author has made a mistake. The multitude will never read it. Thinkers will study its pages. Mr. Hughs marks out his own independent course, and writes history as it is, or, at least, as he understands it. He hews to the line and permits the chips to fly where they will. Mr. Hughs seeks the backing of no great ecclesiastical organization, nor of any other societies or persons. The result will be that those who ask: "Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees believed on him?" will let this volume severely alone.

In this book Mr. Hughs has been his own type-setter, proof-reader and form-maker; the result is a book as unique in its make-up as it is interesting in its contents. The pages are not numbered, but there are about four hundred and fifty of them, and they are as large as the pages of the Arena, or the Popular Science Monthly.

The book is paragraphed, and every paragraph is numbered. Besides that, there are marginal references from each paragraph to every other which will throw additional light on the matter under review.

The book opens with a chapter on "The Infancy of Civilization," in which he shows some of the processes of the development of society and government; and the necessity of the surrender of some of our individual rights to those of society and government. In the next chapter, which he entitles, "Theory and Tradition," the author takes up some of the theories of astronomers and geologists, and also discusses the theory of the beginnings, as found in the Book of Genesis. These things have all been studied in their relation to each other and to their own philosophy.

The first civilization, Mr. Hughs argues, was in this country. From here civilization has always traveled westward. Next Mr. Hughs considers Eastern Asia, including Java, China, and the Aryans. In this he goes as far back as the Stone Age. Then follow historical and philosophical dissertations on Western Asia, Egypt, Phenecia, the Israelites, the Jews, Greece, Carthage and Rome.

This is all followed by a laboriously-prepared and invaluable alphabetical index. Mr. Hughs believes more in governments built on reciprocity and on trade, than in those founded by conquest. The last two paragraphs of his book explains this as follows:

"The admirers of strong government may cite Phenecia and Carthage as examples of the weakness of a people who seek trade instead of conquest and tribute. But they are confronted with the historical fact that governments built upon conquest have no peace or prosperity. They invite retaliation from all the world. When their enemies are subjugated or silenced there is certain to be oppression and rebellion among their subjects.

"Trading Tyre lasted 4,000 years. Carthage maintained an existence of 540 years. The earliest date for Rome is 752 B. C., and Constantine deserted Rome in A. D. 330, so that the extreme length of the longest military power in ancient time is 1,082 years. If we further extend the time to the fall of Constantinople in 1453 the length is only 2,205 years. But the time should be counted from about 400 before Christ, to the fall of the Western Empire, or about 876 years. That is longer than the Assyrian or the Medo-Persian empire lasted. Surely the gods did not favor military government."

I hope The Progressive Thinker will get this book from Mr. Hughs, and keep it on sale. The retail price is, I believe, $2, and the reader of this is hereby assured that he will hardly find an opportunity to make a better investment of that amount of money in literature than to spend it for a copy of Hughs' Ancient Civilization.

MOSES HULL.

A POET'S PROSE.

FRAGRANCE FROM THE LAND OF FRUITS AND FLOWERS.

To the Editor:—I salute you this spring morning with the warm rosy light of sunshine flooding the landscape sparkling in radiant splendor from the rain drops of the past few days' rain storm that gives new freshness to vegetation and a greenness to mountain and vale beyond the power of description. The vines near my study window throw out their jeweled fingers of greeting, and the hummingbirds hover over each clustered flower, sipping the nectar nature has so bountifully prepared for their feast. The roses from a thousand stems lift their sweet faces in adoration, and the calla lilies, fair as vestal virgins, line the pathway, ministrants of holy incense. The altars of day, fresh born, call the world from the toils of the week into the sanctuary of nature to commune with her spirit and to draw from her the inspiration of life and immortality.

Our societies here are not active in a spiritual sense, but with the Children's Lyceum at one of the societies each Sunday morning, and Sunday evening conferences, with an occasional lecture from some itinerant speaker who may chance to be here, we are making slow headway towards the light and spiritual enlightenment, trusting for the good yet in store for those of us who may serve the Lord.

Your Thinker breaks the bread of life to us served up by the stored minds of your correspondents, and is the light that lightens the world. Long may it radiate with its beams of truth.

Brooks, of Wheaton, Ill. Through his untiring energy and unselfish efforts. The society stands on a firm financial, as well as spiritual basis. As a lecturer and psychometrist, he is unexcelled. As a man, socially and morally, he is above reproach. By his genial nature, he has won a host of true friends, and the society individually and as a body, at the close of his services united in expressions of love and esteem for himself and his estimable wife. Resolutions were read by our worthy President, Mrs. Flora S. Jackson, expressing the high regard in which he is held by the society, and it was unanimously resolved that Mr. Brooks be re-engaged to serve us during the months of September and October, 1897, if he is at liberty so to do. A vote of thanks was given him at the close of the services for the very efficient work rendered and the kindly spirit manifested during his stay with us. Clyde Goodrich writes: "Mr. Frank T. Ripley closed his engagement with The Marcellus Progressive Society on Sunday February 28th. Our meetings were very successful, and the attendance was good. The audiences were composed of the very best people in the village, people who dare to think for themselves. Mr. Ripley's lectures were good and his tests and descriptions were simply wonderful. He goes from here to Port Huron, Mich., for this month, where he can be addressed in care of general delivery, for future engagements. Mr. Ripley can be engaged for the last three Sundays in March, also for all the Sundays of April and May."

The call for a Mass-Meeting is signed by leading Spiritualists of the State, and a large meeting is assured. All are invited.

F. A. Wiggins is illuminating Pittsburgh with his tests and addresses. His audiences have been overflowing.

The Spirit Messenger is the name of a new paper published by J. R. Combs and C. M. Folsom, of Springfield, Mo. We hope it will meet with abundant success.

Don't send any communications to this office for publication written with a pencil.

Dr. I. S. Lee would like to have a good slate-writing medium visit Little Rock, Ark. The Doctor has organized a society there.

J. C. F. Grumbine has May, 1897, open, also June for any Western society. Also the first two Sundays in April, owing to change in the East. Address him at 300 Greene avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., or Station P, Chicago.

Ed Humphrey writes from Minnesota: "Your paper comes regularly, and is ever welcome. We could not get along without it. There are very few Spiritualists in this part of the country, but what there are stand by the cause. If we could have some good speaker come this way, for the good of the cause, our circle would enlarge. Would it not be a good plan to have the N. S. A. call on Spiritualists throughout the country to subscribe a certain sum to be used for the purpose of sending missionaries through the country, especially into parts where there are no mediums?"

G. W. Kates writes: "The Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism will be celebrated in Rochester, as never has been the historical date observed; and a prelude to the Semi-Centennial Jubilee will be sounded, with hopefulness to create public interest in that great event. No place has a right to forsake the home celebration and none should deny a gala time next year; but Rochester has special claims for public interest, as here is the birthplace of Modern Spiritualism. There has too long been a lethargy in this city. A few good friends of the cause here have awakened to the necessity for action, and are working heroically to build the local cause. They trust the soon-to-be-organized State Association and the National Association may both regard this as the objective point of their jubilee efforts. The local association has only the one hope, viz: To enlist a wide-spread co-operation, for they are weak to do these great honors and develop this splendid testimonial to the raps and the evoluted cause, now so potent. For the anniversary exercises, March 28, 29 and 30, this year, the large and elegant Fitzhugh Hall, seating two thousand persons, has been engaged, and the following talent employed: Mrs. Zaida Brown Kates, Mrs. Dr. S. Augusta Armstrong, Mrs. M. E. Williams, Lyman C. Howe, Rabbi S. Weil, G. W. Kates and R. D. Jones, a pioneer investigator of the raps. Dr. W. B. Mills, Mrs. Atcheson and Mrs. Kates will be the test mediums. Others will doubtless be present. A large attendance from the State is expected, and all are invited. The new Osborn House will make special rates. An excursion to Hydesville will be made on March 31, if the weather permits."

J. M. White writes from Moberly, Mo.: "At present I am at Moberly, Mo., and expect to remain a week here and then go to Kirksville, Mo. From there I expect to go north to Sioux City, Iowa, and would like engagements for lectures or seances between Kirksville and Sioux City. I will accept engagements either in Missouri or Iowa. My address will be Kirksville the week beginning March 8."

M. H. Wefel writes from Ft. Wayne, Ind.: "Spiritualism in our beautiful city has made very rapid strides during the last six months, and the First Spiritual Society has shaken the foundations of the orthodox churches so effectually that our ministers are beginning to realize the gravity of the situation. They have begun to earn their salaries. Members of their flocks are talking too much Spiritualism, and are investigating a little too much, and it is all the pastors can do to keep their inquisitive and doubting members from leaving them. The fact is, we have got the preachers on the fence, and they hardly know where they are at. The light of Spiritualism is too bright for them, because of the narrowness and bigotry which has darkened their spiritual natures. Brother G. F. Perkins closed his February engagement with us last Sunday, and I wish to say in behalf of Brother Perkins, that his work was appreciated very much, and he has done one society a lasting good. He is a worker all the time, every day in the week, and the society here will surely call on him again some time in the future. Mrs. C. D. Greenamyer, of Cincinnati, O., is with us during March. She comes well recommended."

AS A SPIRITUAL HEALER HAS NO EQUAL! . . . . .

Rejoice and Be Glad! Herald Forth the Tidings of Good Health!

DR. A. B. DOBSON'S

Healing powers are being repeated over and over again through the mediumship of MRS. DR. DOBSON-BARKER, who, for the past year and a half has

of all diseases that flesh is heir to, and will give you proof of her powers, by sending requirements as per small advertisement for diagnosis of your case. Here is one of her many cures:

St. Louis, June 21, 1896.

MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.

With affectionate regards, very truly,

REBECCA LEVY.

8331 Laclede ave., St. Louis Mo.

Military Home, Ohio: "We are daily growing in strength and numbers, and hope to soon stand firmly upon our feet. Our room, although very comfortable, is now altogether inadequate for the numbers who gather each Sunday, to get light upon our philosophy, and we hope to have better accommodations in the near future. Our lecture for Sunday last was delivered by W. V. Neclum, of Dayton, and was received with much enthusiasm. Never in the history of our unprecedented development has the cause stood in need of more bold and fearless workers than at the present time, and I look anxiously about me to see those noble men and women go forth to battle with error and superstition, strong in the knowledge of final victory. The forces upon the spirit side of life have been turning and pruning, and bringing to the front those positive conditions needed now, and we shall see them developed in our speakers and our mediums, and success crown our efforts as never before."

PASSED TO SPIRIT-LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free.]

Mrs. M. L. Kendall passed to the spirit world February 20, 1897, in the 73d year of her age. She was an active worker in the cause of Spiritualism. She leaves three sisters and a brother to mourn her loss. She made her home with her youngest sister, in Davenport, Iowa.

G. W. F.

W. R. Pettengill passed to spirit-life, February 25, 1897, aged 76 years and two months. He lived a Spiritualist, and was not afraid to die a Spiritualist. Being unable to obtain a Spiritualist speaker, we made selections from the Harp and had a poem read which we thought the most appropriate under the circumstances. The funeral was held in the Spiritual Hall, and was conducted by the Odd Fellows.

E. E. P.

Sheboygan, Wis.

Miss Calista Doty, well-known among New York Spiritualists as an enthusiastic and earnest worker in their ranks for many years, passed to her spirit home from her late residence, No. 52 E. 54th street, New York, on Wednesday, February 17, aged 69 years and one month. The funeral services were held at her home, and were conducted by Rev. Charles Henry Eaton, pastor of the Church of the Divine Fraternity (Universalist), of which she and her sisters have been members for nearly thirty years. In her daily life she exercised all the womanly virtues, and was universally respected and highly esteemed. On July 26 of last year, she was preceded to the higher life by her eldest sister, Mary, and now Miss Harriet, also advanced in years, is the only remaining one of the three sisters.

The remains of the two sisters were interred in Mount Hope Cemetery, Rochester, N. Y.

I. R. SANFORD.

Pres. N. Y. Spiritual Temple.

Passed to spirit life, February 15th, 1897, at her home in La Fayette, Ind., Mrs. A. J. Davis, of cancer. Aged 53 years. Mrs. Davis for many years past was an ardent Spiritualist, giving a great deal of her time soliciting subscriptions for The Progressive Thinker, a paper she valued highly. During the past fifteen months her suffering was most painful, enduring two operations which only left her weaker than before. Notwithstanding all her suffering she made all of the arrangements for her departure of this life. She knew the great change was near at hand and anxiously awaited the end, choosing as her text "All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change comes." The remains were taken to Hartford, Mich., for funeral and interment, this being a former home, and amid a bower of flowers, the mortal was laid to rest beside a loved daughter who preceded her into spirit life nine years ago.

Passed to the higher life, on the 19th of February, D. L. Johnson, of Yorkville, Mich. He was one of the early pioneers for the cause of Spiritualism, and a close adherent until the end. He leaves two brothers, Dr. P. T. Johnson, of Battle Creek, and Seymour Johnson, of Berkley, California, and wife and three daughters. He was a noble man, respected citizen and kind parent, living with the knowledge of the higher life. He was interred by the Masonic Fraternity, and a most beautiful tribute it was.

John R. Rutherford was born January 6, 1863. His spirit took its departure from the physical body January 12, 1897.

He was one of the prominent younger physicians of Detroit, Mich. He was a graduate of the Ontario Veterinary College, and also of the Rush Medical College of Chicago. Soon after graduating he located at Rock Island, Ill., where he soon gained the confidence and esteem of both the profession and patrons. Three years ago he was called to the chair of Dean of the Veterinary Department of the Detroit Medical College, where he soon attained great popularity and formed hosts of friends among those engaged in the medical profession. Well-informed in all the advanced thought of the day, he labored to put the best and highest thoughts into all of his undertakings. His college associates say of him "that he was an amiable gentleman, cultured, kind, courteous and thoughtful. He endeared himself to all whom he met, and his sudden death is mourned by many."

At a regular meeting of the Michigan State Temple, No. 1, of the Order of the Magi, held at Lansing, February 1, 1897, resolutions of condolence and sympathy were passed, and an order made that the charter of the Temple be draped for thirty days.

EMINENT MEN AND SPIRITUALISM.

BIG MEN BELIEVE IN GHOSTLY THINGS—PROF. CROOKES'S REMARKABLE THEORIES OF THOUGHT TRANSFERENCE, AND THE INTERESTING CONFESSION OF VICTORIEN SARDOU, THE GREAT PLAYWRIGHT, THAT HE IS A SPIRITUALISTIC MEDIUM AND A BELIEVER IN THE MYSTERIES OF OCCULTISM—AUTOMATIC DRAWINGS MADE BY VICTORIEN SARDOU WHILE UNDER THE GUIDANCE OF SPIRITS—A CHAPTER FROM THE NEW YORK JOURNAL OF FEBRUARY 28.

LETTER FROM GEN. W. H. PARSONS.

To the Editor:—I have read the theory of Rev. Dr. Frank Crane of your city, who elaborates from his subconsciousness the grand and daring conception that as 50,000 souls per hour are born into immortal life, this earth is the breeding ground of the Universe; and that spirits thus numerously departed into the hitherto unknown, at the rate of over one million each day, find their appointed place in the garden spots of suns, planets and worlds of this and other spheres, where are the "many mansions," prepared in the "Heaven of Heavens," by the Infinite Father of all for his immortal children.

I do not know that I would have commended this bold and rare conception of an orthodox clergyman, except to accentuate an opinion, I have heretofore expressed to you, that it is one of the auspicious evidences of the new departure of the less trammeled of the younger clergy, into fields of grander spiritual truths; inspired, beyond doubt, by the overwhelming proofs which modern spirit phenomena have kindled in the hearts of this favored generation; not only in our ranks, but the pews and pulpits of the churches, which we of all men should welcome as the fruits of the sublime philosophy and yet grander facts of modern Spiritualism, demonstrating as no religion has heretofore attempted, except in one solitary case of an imputed bodily Resurrection, which did not prove the soul's immortality—that, indeed, "There is no Death, what seems so, is transition."

But transition so? and to what?

That Dr. Crane answers, when he declares: "It is reasonable to suppose that on most of the celestial bodies there are garden spots fit for the habitation of souls. It is the home idea; and it is infinitely consoling and tender to think even now that on some bright star that winks at you to-night a little colony of those you love, and are congenial with, is waiting for you, to think that even now you behold the bright home where shall be restored to you,

The touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still."

Who can but admire the bold declaration of this unconventional thinker, when he throws off the trammels of ecclesiastic mildewed authority of past ages and says: "I see no reason why the conventional notions of yesterday, utterly unfounded in scripture, except in an absurd literalism, borrowed mostly from monkish speculations from Dante and from Milton, should bind us down, and prevent us from reading our Father's word with all the intelligence we can command."

Mr. Francis—no bolder, nor more independent sentiment against the authority of "an absurd literalism, borrowed from monkish speculation, and utterly unfounded in scripture," was ever uttered in your, at times, extremely radical editorials which I have deprecated in view of our rapid triumphs among the laity and clergy, through our phenomena; and yet I would not present this theory of peopled planets by the souls of this earth, but for the remarkable coincidence of a confirmatory spirit communication of a celestial visitor from the planet Jupiter with remarkable sketches or drawings, of the "Mansions," not prepared by hands, eternal in the Heavens," now occupied by Mozart, Zoroaster and others, given through the automatic writing of a no less medium, than Victorien Sardou, the great French dramatist, who boldly declares his knowledge and belief in spirit phenomena, through other psychics and his own personality.

Thus does modern Spiritualism prove the verity of ancient phenomena, and the boldest flights of such modern expounders of its traditions as Dr. Crane; who among other gems of thought, that could have found no more truthful inspiration, on a spiritual rostrum, asks: "Can it be absurdity to suppose that above and around us abide the spirits of just men made perfect, and that the sympathy and yearning of celestial humanities form no insignificant part of the force that makes the sky the magnificent, yet mute herald of Almighty God? Was this a foreshadowing hint when the men of old peopled the sky with constellations, of forms of departed heroes, that the exaltation we feel when we stand beneath the starry dome, is not only a natural sentiment of wonder at something great, but also, the yearning of our hearts in response to the pulse of all being?"

Victorien Sardou's automatic message through his own hand, from the most refulgent of the planets of our system or family of worlds, which is 900 times larger, and as many degrees in excess of our own in magnificence, is a timely illustration of the possibility of Dr. Crane's theory of the sources of the population of Heaven and the Heaven of Heavens.

The pre-existence of the soul in some other world or sphere, was taught by Plato; inculcated by Origen, the most learned of the Alexandrian Fathers, A. D. 240; is a tenet of Brahminical and Buddhistic theorizing, and largely prevails among intelligent Spiritualists.

Its truth presupposes, not reincarnation here again and again, but a prior existence in other worlds; Dr. Crane's reasonable theory is entirely consistent with Plato's conception of pre-existence—that the souls of men on this planet will people the stars.

W. H. PARSONS.

A CHAPTER FROM THE NEW YORK DAILY JOURNAL.

Professor William Crookes, of Crookes tube fame, the most prominent chemist in England, has just announced to the world that he believes in the possibility of thought transference. He not only believes in it, but claims that it is established by scientific evidence.

He made this announcement in an address to the Society for Psychical Research, of which he was recently elected president. He declared that the truth of thought transference, or telepathy, was proved by the evidence in the published proceedings of the society and in the work "Phantasms of the Living."

The London correspondent of the Journal called on Professor Crookes and had an interview with him.

"Do you consider that the possibility of thought transference has been scientifically proved?" asked the correspondent.

"Undoubtedly," he replied. "It is as real as the electric telegraph."

"But is there any other evidence than that which is published in the proceedings of the Psychical Research Society, such for instance as blackboard drawings, which were imitated with more or less accuracy by a third party to whom the idea was transferred by mental effort?"

"Yes," the professor replied, "those, of course, we regard as valuable evidences, but we have hundreds of instances of messages being conveyed by thought tranference. For instance, a young lady came to London from Scotland and left her dancing shoes behind. After her arrival at the metropolis she by thought transference impressed her sister in Scotland with her wish, and the latter sent on the shoes by the next train."

"That might have been coincidence," suggested the correspondent. "It would be natural if the sister had seen the shoes and, knowing them to have been left behind, sent them on."

"Yes," admitted the professor, "that one case alone would prove nothing, but it is only one out of hundreds. These sisters had been impressing each other in this manner for years, and I could quote dozens of cases in which they conveyed messages from one to the other by mental effort, when they were long distances apart."

"It was evident," says the correspondent, "that while the professor was a sincere enthusiast, he was slightly afraid to be reckoned over credulous. Still, his very name carries weight in this country, and I fancy his opinions and those of his fellow believers are rapidly spreading."

Professor Crookes and those who agree with him maintain that mind can communicate with mind otherwise than through the known channels of the senses.

Distances and all other material considerations are in certain cases no obstacle to such communications. One mind may without physical action of any kind communicate to another not only its thoughts but induce in it sensations of hearing, taste, smell, sight and touch. One person may by purely mental operation bring before another's eyes a sensory hallucination of the first, which will be real to all the senses of the second, even it is said, to his touch.

Such a theory admits the possibility of ghosts. It is, according to Professor Crookes, proved beyond reasonable doubt that a living person can induce in another an hallucination or ghost of himself. If one believes in the immortality of the soul, why should not a disembodied spirit produce a like hallucination? In any case, the probability of the story of the Corsican brothers is maintained by the evidence of the Psychical Research Society.

The mediaeval stories of witchcraft and supernatural apparitions are now believed to be based on the same phenomena as those observed by the Psychical Research Society. Thus modern science finds an element of truthfulness in what the world has long regarded as childish superstition.

No man of science could give greater weight to a statement of his convictions than Professor Crookes. He is now sixty-five years of age, and since the age of seventeen, when he gained the Ashburton scholarship in the Royal College of Chemistry, his career has been one long success. In 1854 he was appointed superintendent of the Radcliffe Observatory, at Oxford. In 1861 he discovered the metal thallium by means of spectrum observations. In 1865 he discovered the sodium amalgamation process for separating gold and silver from their ores.

He designed the radiometer and the otheoscope, for which he was honored by the French Academie des Sciences.

His method of producing extreme vacua made possible the Crookes tube, the Roentgen rays and the incandescent electric lamp. He is president of the Chemical Society and a Fellow of the Royal Society.

Professor Crookes has outlined a theory according to which thought transference is affected by inconceivably minute and rapid ether waves.

After pointing out that vibrations of ether of a certain rapidity produce light, he says that there are higher rates of vibrations which are utterly imperceptible to our senses.

"Is it inconceivable," he asks, "that intense thought, concentrated toward a sensitive being with whom the thinker is in close sympathy, may induce a telepathic chain along which brain waves can go straight to their goal without loss of energy due to distance?"

The British Psychical Research Society has affiliations in this country. The vice-president and head of the New York branch is Professor J. H. Hyslop, who occupies the chair of logic and ethics in Columbia College. Professor Hyslop, discussing the subject, said:

"In my opinion there is no doubt that the possibility of thought transference or telepathy is proved. I have made a few experiments myself. Some years ago I visited a Spiritualist whose claims I wished to investigate. I expressed the opinion that I could repeat some of his experiments and asked a young man present whom I had never seen before to assist me.

"He turned his back and I took a pad of paper and drew on it a triangle with a circle in it. Several persons saw this. I then asked him what he saw, and after a few minutes he said: 'A triangle with a circle in it.' Afterward he explained that he had an hallucination of triangles and circles and that the circles were more persistent.

"Next I drew two sides of a triangle with a plus sign. He had an impression of the two sides of the triangle, but not the plus sign.

"I also drew a pig, and he said: 'I see a pig or a goat.'

"In its present stage telepathy leaves many problems which seem only explainable by Spiritualism. For instance, a medium tells you four facts about yourself, each one of which is known only to one of four friends living in widely separated places, but all were known to a friend now dead. Such a case you will find in the experiments on Mrs. Piper. Is it more reasonable to suppose that she gained her knowledge by thought transference from the four living persons or the one dead person?

"When the fact of telepathic communication between living persons is proved it becomes difficult to argue that a disembodied soul cannot communicate with a living person."

Professor Hyslop stated that an excellent summary of the great body of evidence gathered by the Psychical Research Society would be found in "Thought Transference and Apparitions," by Frederick Podmore. From it the cases quoted hereafter are taken.

Experiments in thought transference have been carried on with proper scientific precautions for a number of years. The work began systematically in England in 1882, when the Psychical Research Society was founded under the presidency of Professor Henry Sidgwick, of Cambridge.

The essence of an experiment is that one mind shall endeavor to communicate with another mind without using any of the known channels of the senses. The person whose mind is to initiate this process is known as the agent and the other as the percipient. Thus the agent draws a geometrical figure on a card and the percipient, who can neither see, hear, taste, touch nor smell what is being done, reproduces the figure. This is a common form of experiment.

Mr. Malcom Guthrie, of Liverpool, carried out 457 experiments, 237 of which were completely successful, 70 gave no result, 82 were partially successful and 68 resulted in misdescriptions.

A very instructive series of experiments was carried on by Herr Schmoll and M. Mabrie in Paris. At first the percipient sat blindfolded in the room with his or her back turned to the agents and eight or ten feet away from them. Afterward the percipient went into another room while the agents were selecting an object.

M. Mabrie put his eyeglasses noiselessly on the table in sight of two other persons. Mlle. Louise, who was blindfolded and whose back was turned, said after five minutes: "I see two curves open above that do not touch each other."

One of the party drew a cat. Six witnesses saw it. Mlle. Jane, who had been out of the room, returned and, without seeing the drawing, after five minutes said: "I see a cat's head." She drew it. Many similar successes were obtained.

When a percipient is put into a hypnotic state he becomes far more sensitive to thought waves. Among many other cases, Dr. A. A. Liebault, of Paris, states that he put a young woman into a hypnotic sleep. Then he wrote on a piece of paper: "On awakening mademoiselle will see her black hat transformed into a red one." This he showed to six persons, but the subject could not see it. She was awakened, and immediately exclaimed that her hat had been exchanged for a red one.

Dr. A. Gibotteau records the following experiment:

"Mme. P. complained of headache. I placed my hand upon her forehead, and in a few minutes she was in a light, hypnotic sleep. Without deepening the trance, I endeavored to give her a sensation of calm and well-being, and to procure this sensation for myself, in the first place, I called up a picture of the sea, in which air and water were full of sunlight. 'I feel a little better,' she said; 'how fresh the air is!' I then proceeded to imagine myself walking along the Boulevard St. Michel in a slight rain. I saw the hurrying people and the umbrellas. 'How strange it is!' said Mme. P., 'I seem to be at the corner of the Boulevard St. Michel and the Rue des Ecoles, in front of the Cafe Vachette (the exact spot I pictured); it is raining; there are a great many people, a hurrying crowd. They are all going up the street, and I with them. The air is very fresh. It gives me a pleasant, restful feeling.' With these words she opened her eyes and gave me a further confirmation of her impressions.

"I should add that this scene took place in the provinces. I had not been in Paris for some months, nor Mme. P. for several years.

"There had been no mention of the subject in the course of our conversation that day."

Dr. Blair Thaw, of New York, has made some remarkably successful experiments in thought transference.

In one experiment, which occurred on April 28, 1892, Dr. Thaw and a Mr. Wyatt called up in their minds a picture of the first flying machine going over the Madison Square tower and the crowd of people witnessing it. Mrs. Thaw was to endeavor to see the picture which they were creating in their minds. She was in a passive state, a condition not easy to distinguish from the lighter stages of sleep walking.

Mrs. Thaw began to speak:

"I see lots of people. Crowds are going to war. They are so excited. Are they throwing water? Or sailors pulling at ropes?"

Dr. Thaw here asked: "What are they doing?"

"They are all looking up," the percipient answered.

"I thought of a possible scene in the future," said Dr. Thaw.

Oh," exclaimed Mrs. Thaw. "It's the first man flying. That's what he's doing up there."

One person may silently will another to perform a certain action without contact between the two. This has been demonstrated by many reliable experiments. In one series Dr. Blair Thaw and Mr. M. H. Wyatt were agents and Mrs. Thaw percipient. The agents went into a room alone and selected a wooden cupid from a cornerpiece in the room having eight other objects on it. The percipient was sent for. She first brought a photograph from the lower shelf of the cornerpiece and then said: "It's the wooden cupid." Many other successful experiments of the same character were made.

It has been pointed out that there is a connection between thought transference and Spiritualism, for the evidence that supports the former is also to some extent valuable to the latter.

Public notice is now directed to an eminent believer in Spiritualism. The recent production of "Spiritisme" in Paris and New York has called attention to the fact Victorien Sardou, the greatest of French dramatists, is a Spiritualist.

A journal correspondent visited M. Sardou, and questioned him concerning his beliefs.

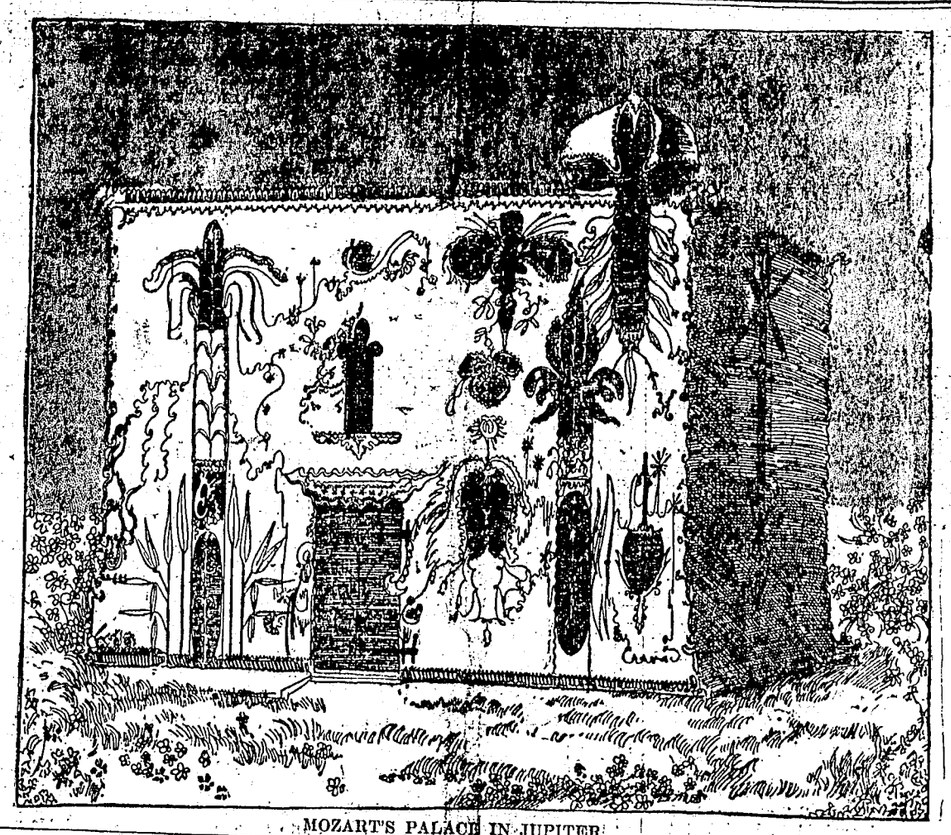
One result of this visit was that M. Sardou gave very remarkable drawings which he had been enabled to make by Bernard Palissy and other dead artists.

"I am certainly a Spiritualist," M Sardou said. "I have been a medium, and if the opinion of authorized persons goes for anything, a very powerful medium, since I had at my house a little table which used to go up and down in obedience to all my orders, and since I used to have in mid-winter presents of flowers, for I often found, on waking up in the morning, my bed covered with roses, lilies, pinks, and even exotic blooms."

"How did this come about?"

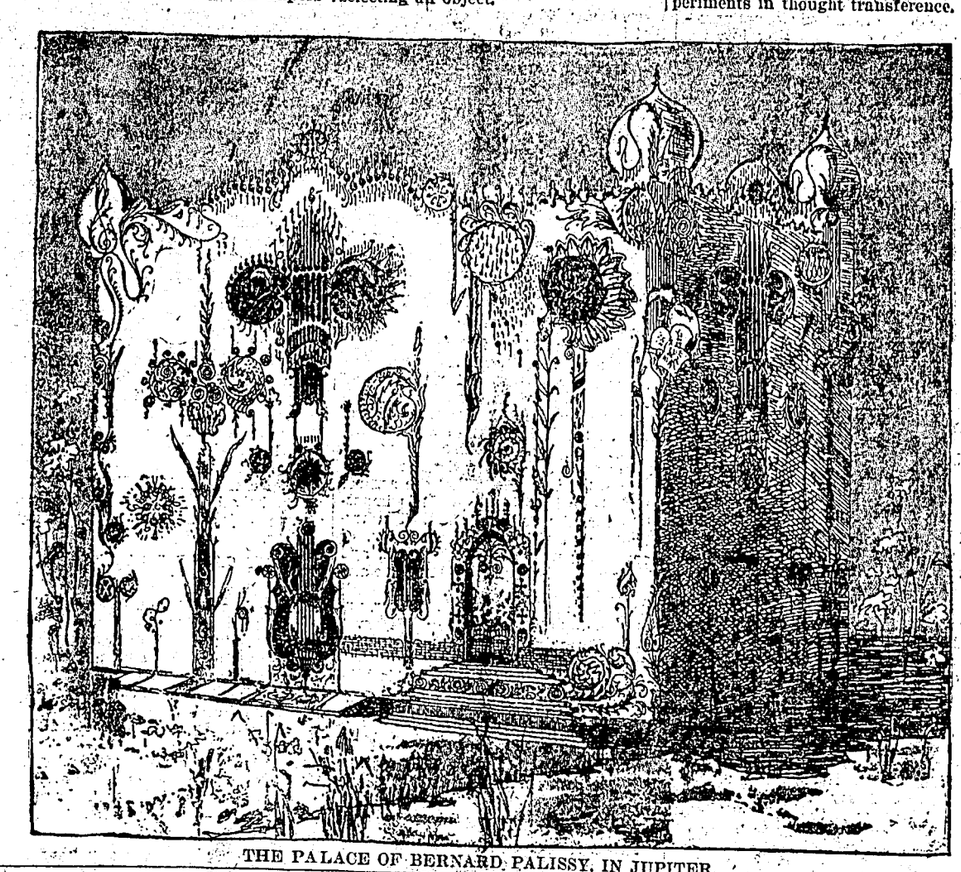
"It was about 1851. I was then a student, inquisitive and given to investigation; consumed with the desire of knowing everything, and resolved to read everything. I was on very friendly terms with M. Goujon, the astronomer and the secretary of M. Arago, director of the Observatory of Paris. One evening when we were talking together along the avenue of the Observatory, he said to me, 'I should very much like to confide something in you, but I am sure you will make fun of me. One of the Misses Fox is at the present moment in Paris, and gave a seance the day before yesterday at the house of the Consul of the United States. The latter had asked Arago to go, but he was unwell and couldn't, so he asked his nephew, Mathieu, and myself to go in his place. We went. There we heard a table laid for twelve make a cracking noise. The same table then stood up on its two legs on the right side. We tried with all our strength to prevent it rising any more, but were all lifted off the ground. This story indeed amused me immensely, and I said to myself that my friend would be all the better if he ducked his head in cold water a few times.

"We did not at first dare to tell Arago, but as he asked us about the experiment we related to him the facts exactly as they were. 'Did you really see that?' he said to us. 'My children, a fact is a fact. It is no good striving against a fact. One ought to be satisfied to simply record it; and if the cause of it escapes us, who knows that perhaps the future may not reveal it?'



"Some time after that, having to prepare for the Larousse Dictionary important geographical investigations, I made a serious and profound study of the reformers, whom I then compared with the Fathers of the Church. The balance of my opinion was in favor of the latter. Notwithstanding that I quickly perceived that Christian doctrine was nothing else than Platonic morality, but more noble, more lofty and yet more accessible to simple minds. It was superimposed material of the first order, but none the less superimposed material, and of all those beliefs I made short work. I dismissed them all.

"On the other hand, I perceived in all the sacred books of the world that two great doctrines were included and set forth with more or less clearness—the pre-existence of the soul as regards the body which it animates, and the gradual progression of the soul toward perfection. Since then, influenced perhaps by the reply of Arago to his pupils, I did my best to attend spiritualistic seances. I made several vain attempts, but at last I happened to be at the house of a lady named Japhet, where I made the acquaintance of Rivaille, who had just been baptized Allen-Kardec, and of De Leymarie, who is at the present moment director of the Revue Spirite, founded by the former. Thanks to them, I was at length able to perceive interesting phenomena, until at length I met with Home, whom I have seen with my own eyes float in the air about a yard above the flooring of the room, thus contradicting all the laws of weight.



"I had already seen glimmerings moving about in the air, heard music in the corners of the rooms and perceived other analogous things, so I wished in my turn to become a medium. I tried to write without making any voluntary movement, but the pencil remained immovable. The Baron du Potel, whom I knew, advised me, however, to continue my efforts of will.

"Some days afterward my hands traced these words: 'I am Bernard Palissy.' 'Very good,' I answered, 'I am delighted to make your acquaintance, but tell me all about your kind of existence, the place where you dwell and what you do generally.' 'I live in Jupiter,' he answered. 'Since that is so, will you describe for me the buildings on that planet, about which I just happen to have to write an article,' Bernard Palissy made me at first a sketch of his house, then one of Mozart's, and then one of Zoroaster's. I have still the originals of these drawings. There they are, and I intrust them to you so that you can reproduce them, as you wish to do so. The drawings of the house of Mozart has this peculiarity, that instead of having been made by the pen like the others, it was traced with burin before a number of persons who denied the possibility of the fact, seeing that I had never known how to draw, much less engrave. My ability as a medium lasted for about eighteen months more, after which it suddenly ceased.

"In 1858 I published in the Revue Spirite one of these designs accompanying it with notes and an article containing all that Bernard Palissy had revealed to me on the subject of Jupiter."

THE PALACE OF BERNARD PALISSY, IN JUPITER.

PERSONS AND EVENTS.

MEDIUMS AND WORKERS, OLD AND NEW.

I finished my month in Cleveland with a lecture in Akron! After a skip to Chagrin Falls, where we met the angels half way in Army and Navy Hall, and sweetened on new maple syrup, I wrestled with lagrippe, in the pleasant home, and spiritual atmosphere, at 59 Vienna street, Cleveland, and then, by electric motor to Akron Sunday afternoon. There I met old friends and new, and enjoyed the honor of ministering to Brother Schemerhorn's splendid society. He has been with them now six consecutive months, and still the interest increases. We had a packed hall Sunday evening and often a score or two are turned away for want of standing room; and the hall is large.

Mr. Fred. E. Moore is a promising young medium and quite enthusiastic, developed within the past year.

Dr. Schemerhorn is evidently a builder, and that is the need of the hour. Destroyers may still be needful, but builders vastly more so. Thirty years ago last October, I gave a course of twelve lectures in Akron; and have never been there since, until last Sunday. It must have been a pretty good meal to last thirty years! In a few years more, electric cars will, doubtless, unite all important places, so that approach to the interior will be easy, and cheap, all over the State, and through other States as well. At Akron I enjoyed the hospitality of Brother and Sister Keck, and there visited with my old friend, C. S. Curtis, whose vigorous mind is always pushing for new truth, and the utilization of old truths, for the healing of nations. I found him increased by a half since I had before met him, and the new half is a fine medium, and he seems happy in his resurrection. He is entitled to it, for he has suffered as few men have; but a brave honest appreciation of the eternal meanings of life, sustained him through every ordeal. Only those who have suffered, and arisen from the wrecks of the valley, can understand such lives, or appreciate the conditions and trials of sympathetic souls, wrenched by adverse fortune, and pierced by the arrows of death, until every mortal tie, is severed, and love weeps in silence and alone. Pain purifies. Our mortal affluities master the spiritual attractions, until weaned by the chastenings of sorrow. Here, too, I met my old friend Horace W. Tiballs, the world-famed artist, whose Garfield picture too the first premium, and was the admiration of artists. He has had many telling tests of spirit presence, and identity, of which I may be permitted to speak later.

Back to my spiritual center, the home of S. H. Powell 59 Vienna street, I find my hostess—Mrs. Henderson—slowly improving, after a two weeks illness; and Johnnie saking Grip into the snow and off for his Medical College. I am glad to see progressive young men and women, qualifying for the profession; and when well equipped with college lore, they can add the spiritual to their practice, and thus slowly eliminate the medical despotism that has become one of the most dangerous of trusts. Mediums stand a poor chance in attempting to fight the combines, whose money and diplomacy rule legislation. But when we have a majority of liberals equipped with orthodox diplomas, the power of the quack's ring can be broken. I say "quack's ring" because I hold that only quack's, conscious of their ignorance and incapacity, seek the aid of legislation to compel the sick public to patronize them, and pay fabulous prices, for a display of their ignorance.

I have been especially fortunate in being allowed, to share the hospitality of this sweet home, and its elevating spiritual atmosphere, so tangible to my spiritual nerves. Thirty-seven years ago I spoke in Cleveland, when Dr. C. D. Griswold was publishing the "Sunbeam" here. Then "platform tests" were unknown; but we had large, enthusiastic, audiences, and new accessions to our ranks daily. Here that wonderfully gifted woman, Mrs. F. O. Hyzer has done much good work, and her peculiarly gifted sister—Mrs. Hazen—is still here, slowly recovering from a long illness. She is in her 79th year, and her spiritual gifts active as ever. During a short call she gave me some tokens from Maudie, significant, and convincing.

Last evening, March 1, as I sat talking with Mrs. Henderson, I suddenly felt a pressure on the top of my head. I felt no form of a hand, but the pressure seemed like a strong hand laid on my head and pressing down with great force. Nothing could be more tangible, and it was like the weight of twenty or thirty pound's pressure! In my astonishment, I asked Mrs. Henderson if she could see anything on my head. She looked, and said: "Why, yes! I see a bluish white vapor, in a changing activity and it rises to quite a distance above your head." Was it coincidence? Or was it a spiritual reality?

IN TWILIGHT HOUR.

In twilight hour my long-lost love comes back,
I catch again the perfume of her hair,
And see her moving swift across the track
Of years that were so free of cark and care.

I see her shining eyes, so full of love,
The soft, round cheek that wore the roses' kiss—
Dear eyes that caught their light from skies above,
And dainty cheeks that held the dimples' bliss!

In twilight hour that voice so sweet to me
In happy whispers thrills my weary heart;
Sometimes it ripples o'er with mirth and glee,
Sometimes, emotions deeper ply their art.

I see her bosom's glory rise and fall,
Her hand is lightly laid upon my head,
And, as the nightbirds to each other call,
I see my darling—risen from the dead!

COLONEL R. G. INGERSOLL.

HE DELIVERS A CHARACTERISTIC LECTURE ON "TRUTH."

There Was an Immense Audience, Demonstrating His Great Popularity.

IN THE LIGHT OF GRAND TRUTH —COLONEL ROBERT G. INGERSOLL LECTURES AT THE COLUMBIA—A LARGE AUDIENCE PRESENT — EPIGRAMMATIC GEMS, CHARACTERISTICS OF A MASTERLY DISCOURSE—GREAT AGNOSTIC DWELLS AT LENGTH ON THE SEEN AS DISTINGUISHED FROM THE UNSEEN.

Truth was the subject of a lecture March 6th, by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll at the Columbia Theater, Chicago. Not a seat was vacant when Colonel Ingersoll made his bow to the audience, which was as friendly as large. His sentences were of epigrammatic force and his brilliancy of illustration captured his hearers as always. Following is the discourse in full, as set forth in the Inter Ocean:

Primeval man changed two of his feet into hands, and in the darkness of his brain there came a few glimmerings of reason. He was injured by ignorance, by fear, by mistakes, and he advanced only as he found the truth, only as he got into harmony with facts. Through countless years he has groped, and crawled, and struggled, and stumbled toward the whole truth. He has been deceived by altars and prophets, by popes and priests. He has been haunted by saints, and deluded by apostles. He has been frightened by devils and by gods. He has been robbed by chiefs and plundered by kings, and in the name of adoration his mind has been filled with mistakes, with the impossible, with the absurd, and infamous, and in the name of religion he has been taught humility and arrogance, love and hatred, forgiveness and revenge.

But at last the world has changed. We are tired of the bibles of barbarians and the creeds of savagery. We want knowledge, and when I say that, I mean sane and sensible people of this planet. (Applause.)

Nothing is greater—nothing is of more importance than to find, amid the errors and darkness of this life, a shining truth.

Truth is the intellectual wealth of the world.

The noblest of occupations is to search for truth.

Truth is the foundation, the superstructure, and the glittering dome of progress.

Truth is the mother of joy. Truth civilizes, ennobles, and purifies. The grandest ambition that can enter the soul is to know the truth.

Truth gives man the greatest power for good. Truth is sword and shield. It is the sacred light of the soul.

The man who finds a truth lights a torch.

How is truth to be found?

By investigation, experiment, and reason.

Every human being should be allowed to investigate to the extent of his desire—his ability. The literature of the world should be open to him—nothing prohibited, sealed, or hidden. No subject can be too sacred to be understood. Each person should be allowed to reach his own conclusions and to speak his honest thought.

He who threatens the investigator with punishment here, or hereafter, is an enemy of the human race. And he who tries to bribe the investigator with the promise of eternal joy is a traitor to his fellowmen.

There is no real investigation without freedom—freedom from the fear of gods and men.

So, all investigation—all experiment—should be pursued in the light of reason.

Every man should be true to himself—true to the inward light. Each man, in the laboratory of his own mind, and for himself alone, should test the so-called facts—the theories of all the world. Truth, in accordance with his reason, should be his guide and master. To love the truth, thus perceived, is mental virtue—intellectual purity. This is true manhood. This is freedom.

To throw away your reason at the command of churches, popes, parties, kings, or gods, is to be a serf, a slave.

MAN SHOULD BE MENTALLY HONEST.

It is not simply the right, but it is the duty of every man to think—to investigate for himself—and every man who tries to prevent this by force or fear is doing all he can to degrade and enslave his fellowmen.

He should preserve as his most precious jewel the perfect veracity of his soul.

He should examine all questions presented to his mind, without prejudice—unbiased by hatred or love—by desire or fear. His object and his only object should be to find the truth. He knows, if he listens to reason, that truth is not dangerous and that error is. He should weigh the evidence, the arguments, in honest scales—scales that passion or interest cannot change. He should care nothing for authority—nothing for names, customs or creeds—nothing for anything that his reason does not say is true.

Of this world he should be the sovereign, and his soul should wear the purple. From his dominions should be banished the hosts of force and fear. He should be intellectually hospitable. Prejudice, egotism, hatred, contempt, disdain, are the enemies of truth and progress.

The real searcher after truth will not receive the old because it is old, or reject the new because it is new. He will not believe men because they are dead, or contradict them because they are alive. With him an utterance is worth the truth, the reason it contains, without the slightest regard to the author. He may have been a king or serf—a philosopher or servant—but the utterance neither gains nor loses in truth or reason. Its value is absolutely independent of the fame or station of the man who gave it to the world.

TRUTH CAN STAND ALONE.

Nothing but falsehood needs the assistance of fame and place, of robes and miters, of tiaras and crowns.

The wise, the really honest and intelligent, are not swayed or governed by numbers—by majorities.

They accept what they really believe to be true. They care nothing for the opinions of ancestors, nothing for creeds, assertions, and theories, unless they satisfy the reason.

In all directions they seek for truth, and when found, accept it with joy—accept it in spite of preconceived opinions—in spite of prejudice and hatred.

This is the course pursued by wise and honest men, and no other course is possible for them.

In every department of human endeavor men are seeking for the truth—for the facts. The statesman reads the history of the world, gathers the statistics of all nations to the end that his country may avoid the mistakes of the past. The geologist penetrates the rocks in search of facts—climbs mountains, visits the extinct craters, traverses islands and continents that he may know something of the history of the world. He wants the truth.

The chemist, with crucible and retort, with countless experiments, is trying to find the qualities of substances—to ravel what nature has woven.

The great mechanics dwell in the realm of the real. They seek by natural means to conquer and use the forces of nature. They want the truth—the actual facts.

The physicians, the surgeons, rely on observation, experiment, and reason. They become acquainted with the human body—with muscle, blood, and nerve—with the wonders of the brain. They want nothing but the truth.

SUPPRESS NOT THE TRUTH.

And so it is with the students of every science. On every hand they look for facts, and it is of the utmost importance that they give to the world the facts they find.

Their courage should equal their intelligence. No matter what the dead have said or the living believe, they should possess intellectual courage.

If it be good for man to find the truth— good for him to be intellectually honest and hospitable, then it is good for others to know the truths thus found.

Every man should have the courage to give his honest thought. This makes the finder and publisher of truth a public benefactor.

Those who prevent, or try to prevent, the expression of honest thought, are the foes of civilization—the enemies of truth. Nothing can exceed the egotism and impudence of the man who claims the right to express his thought and denies the same right to others.

It will not do to say that certain ideas are sacred, and that man has not the right to investigate and test these ideas for himself.

Who knows that they are sacred? Can anything be sacred to us that we do not know to be true?

For many centuries free speech has been an insult to God. Nothing has been more blasphemous than the expression of honest thought. For many ages the lips of the wise were sealed. The torches that truth had lighted, that courage carried and held aloft, were extinguished with blood.

Truth has always been in favor of free speech—has always asked to be investigated—has always longed to be known and understood. Freedom, discussion, honesty, investigation, and courage are the friends and allies of truth. Truth loves the light and the open field. It appeals to the senses—to the judgment, the reason, to all the higher and nobler faculties and powers of the mind. It seeks to calm the passions, to destroy prejudice, and to increase the volume and intensity of reason's flame.

It does not ask man to cringe or crawl. It does not desire the worship of the ignorant or the praises of the frightened.

It says to every human being: "Think for yourself. Enjoy the freedom of a god, and have the goodness and the courage to express your honest thought."

WHY TRUTH SHOULD BE KNOWN.

Why should we pursue the truth? and why should we investigate and reason? and why should we be mentally honest and hospitable? and why should we express our honest thoughts?

To this there is but one answer: For the benefit of mankind.

The brain must be developed. The world must think. Speech must be free. The world must learn that credulity is not a virtue and that no question is settled until reason is fully satisfied.

By these means man will overcome many of the obstructions of nature. He will cure or avoid diseases. He will lessen pain. He will lengthen, ennoble, and enrich life. In every direction he will increase his power. He will satisfy his wants, gratify his tastes. He will put a roof and raiment, food and fuel, home and happiness within the reach of all.

He will drive want and crime from the world. He will destroy the serpents of fear, the monsters of superstition. He will become intelligent and free, honest and serene.

The monarch of the skies will be dethroned—the flames of hell will be extinguished. Pious beggars will become honest and useful men. Hypocrisy will collect no tolls from fear, lies will not be sacrificed for another, human beings will love each other instead of gods, men will do right, not for the sake of reward in some other world, but for the sake of happiness here. Man will find that nature is the only revelation, and that he, by his own efforts, must learn to read the stories told by star and cloud, by rock and soil, by sea and stream, by rain and fire, by plant and flower, by life in all its curious forms, and all the things and forces of the world.

When he reads these stories, these records, he will know that man must rely on himself—that the supernatural does not exist, and that man must be the providence of man.

WHO WOULD HIDE THE TRUTH?

All that I have said seems to be true—almost self-evident—and you may ask, who it is that says slavery is better than liberty. Let me tell you.

All the Popes and priests, all the orthodox churches and clergymen, say that they have a revelation from God.

The Protestant say that it is the duty of every person to read, to understand, and to believe this revelation—that a man should use his reason; but if he honestly concludes that the Bible is not a revelation from God, and dies with that conclusion in his mind, he will be tormented forever. They say: "Read," and then add: "Believe or be damned."

"No matter how unreasonable the Bible may appear to you, you must believe. No matter how impossible the miracles may seem, you must believe. No matter how cruel the laws, your heart must approve them all!"

This is what the church calls the liberty of thought.

We read the Bible under the scowl and threat of God. We read by the glare of hell. On one side is the Devil, with the instruments of torture in his hands. On the other, God, ready to launch the infinite curse. And the church says to the readers: "You are free to decide. God is good, and he gives you the liberty to choose."

The Popes and the priests say to the poor people: "You need not read the Bible. You cannot understand it. That is the reason it is called a revelation. We will read it for you, and you must believe what we say. We carry the key to hell. Contradict us and you become eternal convicts in the prison of God."

This is the freedom of the Catholic Church.

And all these priests and clergymen insist that the Bible is superior to human reason—that it is the duty of man to accept it— to believe it, whether he really thinks it is true or not, and without the slightest regard to evidence or reason.

It is his duty to cast out from the temple of his soul the goddess Reason, and bow before the coiled serpent of Fear.

This is what the church calls virtue.

Under these conditions what can thought be worth? The brain, swept by the sirocco of God's curse, becomes a desert.

But this is not all.

THE CHURCH AND TRUTH.

To compel man to desert the standard of Reason, the church does not entirely rely on the threat of eternal pain to be endured in another world, but holds out the reward of everlasting joy. To those who believe, it promises the endless ecstacies of heaven. If it cannot frighten, it will bribe. It relies on fear and hope.

A religion, to command the respect of intelligent men, should rest on a foundation of established facts. It should appeal, not to passion, not to hope and fear, but to the judgment. It should ask that all the faculties of the mind, all the senses, should assemble and take counsel together, and that its claims be passed upon and tested without prejudice, without fear, in the calm of perfect candor.

But the church cries: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Without this belief there is no salvation. Salvation is the reward for belief.

Belief is, and forever must be, the result of evidence. A promised reward is not evidence. It sheds no intellectual light. It establishes no fact, answers no objection, and dissipates no doubt.

Is it honest to offer a reward for belief?

The man who gives money to a judge or juror for a decision or verdict is guilty of a crime. Why? Because he induces the Judge, the juror, to decide, not according to the law, to the facts, the right, but according to the bribe.

The bribe is not evidence.

So the promise of Christ to reward those who will believe is a bribe. It is an attempt to make a promise take the place of evidence. He who says that he believes and does this for the sake of reward corrupts his soul.

Suppose I should say that at the center of the earth there is a diamond 100 miles in diameter, and that I would give $10,000 to any man who would believe my statement. Could such a promise be regarded as evidence?

Intelligent people would ask not for rewards, but reasons. Only hypocrites would ask for the money.

Yet, according to the New Testament, Christ offers a reward to those who would believe, and this promised reward was to take the place of evidence. When Christ made this promise he forgot, ignored or held in contempt the rectitude of a brave, free and natural soul.

The declaration that salvation is the reward for belief is inconsistent with mental freedom, and could have been made by no man who thought that evidence sustained the slightest relation to belief.

Every sermon in which men have been told that they could save their souls by believing has been an injury. Such sermons dull the moral sense and subvert the true conception of virtue and duty.

The true man, when asked to believe, asks for evidence. The true man who asks another to believe offers evidence.

But this is not all.

In spite of the threat of eternal pain—of the promise of everlasting joy, unbelievers increased, and the churches took another step.

The churches said to the unbelievers, the heretics: "Although our God will punish you forever in another world—in his prison—the doors of which open only to receive, we unless you believe, will torment you now."

And then the members of these churches, led by priests, popes and clergymen, sought out their unbelieving neighbors—chained them in dungeons, stretched them on racks, crushed their bones, cut out their tongues, extinguished their eyes, flayed them alive, and consumed their poor bodies in flames.

All this was done because these Christian savages believed in the dogma of eternal pain. Because they believed that heaven was the reward for belief. So believing, they were the enemies of free thought and speech—they cared nothing for conscience, nothing for the veracity of a soul—nothing for the manhood of a man.

THE SCIENCE OF THEOLOGY.

All the sciences—except theology—are eager for facts—hungry for the truth. On the brow of a finder of a fact the laurel is placed.

In a theological seminary, if a professor finds a fact inconsistent with the creed, he must keep it a secret or deny it, or lose his place. Mental veracity is a crime, cowardice and hypocrisy are virtues.

A fact inconsistent with the creed is denounced as a lie, and the man who declares or announces the fact is a blasphemer. Every professor breathes the air of insincerity. Every one is mentally dishonest. Every one is a pious fraud. Theology is the only dishonest science—the only one that is based on belief—on credulity—the only one that abhors investigation, that despises thought and denounces reason.

All the great theologians in the Catholic Church have denounced reason as the light furnished by the enemy of mankind—as the road that leads to perdition. All the great Protestant theologians, from Luther to the orthodox clergy of our time, have been the enemies of reason. All orthodox churches of all ages have been the enemies of science. They attacked the astronomers as though they were criminals—the geologists as though they were assassins. They regarded physicians as the enemies of God—as men who were trying to defeat the decrees of Providence. The biologists, the anthropologists, the archeologists, the readers of ancient inscriptions, the delvers in buried cities, were all hated by the theologians. They were afraid that these men might find something inconsistent with the Bible.

The theologian attacked those who studied other religions. They insisted that Christianity was not a growth—not an evolution—but a revelation. They denied that it was in any way connected with any natural religion.

SOURCE OF ALL RELIGIONS.

The facts now show beyond all doubt that all religions came from substantially the same source—but there is not an orthodox Christian theologian who will admit the facts. He must defend his creed—his revelation. He cannot afford to be honest. He was not educated in an honest school. He was not taught to be honest. He was taught to believe and to defend his belief, not only against argument, but against facts.

There is not a theologian in the whole world who can produce the slightest, the least particle of evidence tending to show that the Bible is the inspired word of God.

Where is the evidence that the book of Ruth was written by an inspired man? Where is the evidence that God is the author of the "Song of Solomon?" Where is the evidence that any human being has been inspired? Where is the evidence that Christ was and is God? Where is the evidence that the places called heaven and hell exist—where is the evidence that a miracle was ever wrought?

There is none.

Theology is entirely independent of existence?

Where is the evidence that angels and ghosts—that devils and gods exist? Have these beings been seen or touched? Does one of our senses certify to their existence?

The theologians depend on assertions. They have no evidence. They claim that their inspired book is superior to reason and independent of evidence.

They talk about probability—analogy—inferences, but they present no evidence. They say that they know that Christ lived, in the same way that they know that Caesar lived. They might add that they know Moses talked with Jehovah on Sinai the same way they know Brigham Young talked with God in Utah. The evidence in both cases is the same—none in either.

How do they prove that Christ rose from the dead? They find the account in a book. Who wrote the book? They do not know. What evidence is this? None, unless all things found in books are true.

MIRACLES NOT TO BE BELIEVED.

It is impossible to establish one miracle except by another—and that would have to be established by another still, and so on without end. Human testimony is not sufficient to establish a miracle. Each human being, to be really convinced, must witness the miracle for himself.

They say that Christianity was established—proven to be true by miracles wrought nearly two thousand years ago. Not one of these miracles can be established except by impudent and ignorant assertion—except by poisoning and deforming the minds of the ignorant and the young. To succeed, the theologians invade the cradle, the nursery. In the brain of innocence they plant the seeds of superstition. They pollute the minds and imaginations of children. They frighten the happy with threats of pain—they soothe the wretched with gilded lies.

This perpetual insincerity stamps itself on the face—affects every feature. We all know the theological countenance—cold, unsympathetic, cruel, lighted with a pious smirk—no line of laughter—no dimpled mirth—no touch of humor—nothing human.

This face is a rebuke, a reprimand to natural joy. It says to the happy: "Beware of the dog"—"Prepare for death." This face, like the fabled Gorgon, turns cheerfulness to stone. It is a protest against pleasure—a warning and a threat.

You see every soul is a sculptor that fashions the features, and in this way reveals itself.

Every thought leaves its impress.

The student of this science of theology must be taught in youth—in his mother's arms. These lies must be sown and planted in his brain the first of all. He must be taught to believe, to accept without question. He must be told that it is wicked to doubt, that it is sinful to inquire—that faith is a virtue and unbelief a crime.

HOW MAN IS MISLED.

In this way his mind is poisoned, paralyzed. On all other subjects he has liberty—and in all other directions he is urged to study and think. From his mother's arms he goes to the Sunday school. His poor little mind is filled with miracles and wonders. He is told about a God who made the world and who rewards and punishes. He is told that this God is the author of the Bible—that Christ is his son. He is told about original sin and the atonement, and he believes what he hears. No reasons are given—no facts—no evidence is presented—nothing but assertion. If he asks questions, he is silenced by more solemn assertions and warned against the devices of the evil one. Every Sunday school is a kind of inquisition where they torture and deform the minds of children—where they force their souls into Catholic or Protestant molds—and do all they can to destroy the originality, the individuality, and the veracity of the soul. In the theological seminary the destruction is complete.

When the minister leaves the seminary he is not seeking the truth. He has it. He has a revelation from God, and he has a creed in exact accordance with that revelation. His business is to stand by that revelation and to defend that creed. Arguments against the revelation and the creed he will not read, he will not hear. All facts that are against his religion he will deny. It is impossible for him to be candid. The tremendous "verities" of eternal joy, of everlasting pain are in his creed, and they result from believing the false and denying the true.

Investigation is an infinite danger, unbelief is an infinite offense and deserves and will receive infinite punishment. In the shadow of this tremendous "fact" his courage dies, his manhood is lost, and in his fear he cries out that he believes, whether he does or not.

He says and teaches that credulity is safe and thought dangerous. Yet he pretends to be a teacher—a leader, one selected by God to educate his fellowmen.

CHURCH SCOFFS AT SCIENCE.

These orthodox ministers have been the slanderers of the really great men of our century. They denounced Lyell, the great geologist, for giving facts to the world. They hated and belittled Humboldt, one of the greatest and most intellectual of the race. They ridiculed and derided Darwin, the greatest naturalist, the keenest observer, the best judge of the value of a fact, the most wonderful discoverer of truth that the world has produced.

In every orthodox pulpit stood a traducer of the greatest of scientists—of one who filled the world with intellectual light.

The church has been the enemy of every science, of every real thinker, and for many centuries has used her power to prevent intellectual progress.

Ministers ought to be free. They should be the heralds of the ever-coming day, but they are the bats, the owls, that inhabit ruins, that hate the light. They denounce honest men who express their thoughts, as blasphemers, and do what they can to close their mouths. For their Bible they ask the protection of law. They wish, to be shielded from laughter by the Legislature. They ask that the arguments of their opponents be answered by the courts. This is the result of a due admixture of cowardice, hypocrisy, and malice.

What valuable fact has been proclaimed from an orthodox pulpit? What ecclesiastical council has added to the intellectual wealth of the world?

Many centuries ago the church gave to Christendom a code of laws, stupid, unphilosophic, and brutal to the last degree.

The church insists that it has made man merciful and just. Did it do this by torturing heretics—by extinguishing their eyes—by flaying them alive? Did it accomplish this result through the inquisition—by the use of the thumbscrew, the rack and the fagot? Of what sciences has the church been the friend and champion? What orthodox church has opened its doors to a persecuted truth? Of what use has Christianity been to mankind?

CHURCH OPPOSES EDUCATION.

They tell us that the church has been and is the friend of education. I deny it. The church founded colleges not to educate men, but to make proselytes, converts, defenders. This was in accordance with the instinct of self-preservation. No orthodox church ever was, or ever will be, in favor of real education. A Catholic is in favor of enough education to make a Catholic out of a savage, and the Protestant is in favor of enough education to make a Protestant out of a Catholic, but both are opposed to the education that makes free and manly men.

So, ministers say that they teach charity. This is natural. They live on alms. All beggars teach that others should give.

So, they tell us that the church has built hospitals. This is not true. Men have not built hospitals because they were Christians, but because they were men. They have not built them for charity—but in self-defense.

If a man comes to your door with the small-pox, you cannot let him in, you cannot kill him. As a necessity, you provide a place for him. And you do this to protect yourself. With this Christianity has had nothing to do.

The church cannot give, because it does not produce. It is claimed that the church has made men and women forgiving. I admit that the church has preached forgiveness, but it has never forgiven an enemy—never. Against the great and brave thinkers it has coined and circulated countless lies. Never has the church told, or tried to tell, the truth about an honest foe.

CHURCH ENCOURAGES SUPERSTITION.

The church teaches the existence of the supernatural. It believes in the divine sleight-of-hand—in the "presto" and "open sesame" of the infinite; in some invisible being who produces effects without causes and causes without effects; whose caprice governs the world, and who can be persuaded by prayer, softened by ceremony, and who will, as a reward for faith, save men from the natural consequences of their actions.

The church denies the eternal, inexorable sequence of events.

What good has the church accomplished?

It claims to have preached peace because its founder said: "I came not to bring peace but a sword."

It claims to have preserved the family because its founder offered a hundred-fold here and life everlasting to those who would desert wife and children.

So, it claims to have taught the brotherhood of man and that the gospel is for all the world, because Christ said to the woman of Samaria that he came only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and declared that it was not meet to take the bread of the children and cast it unto dogs.

In the name of Christ, who threatened eternal revenge, it has preached forgiveness.

POOR OPINION OF PREACHERS.

Of what use are the orthodox ministers?

They are enemies of pleasure. They denounce dancing as one of the deadly sins. They are shocked at the wickedness of the waltz—the pollution of the polka. They are the enemies of the theater. They slander actors and actresses. They hate them because they are rivals. They are trying to preserve the sacredness of the Sabbath. It fills them with malice to see the people happy on that day. They preach against excursions and picnics—against those who seek the woods and the sea, the shadows and the waves. They insist that for the glory of God husbands and wives who loathe each other should be compelled to live together. They abhor all works of fiction, and love the Bible. They declare that the literary masterpieces of the world are unfit to be read. They think that people should be satisfied with sermons and poems about death and hell. They hate art—abhor the marbles of the Greeks, and all representations of human form. They want nothing painted or sculptured but hands, faces, and clothes. Most of the priests are prudes, and publicly denounce what they secretly admire and enjoy. They pretend to believe in moral suasion, and want everything regulated by law. If they had the power, they would prohibit everything that men and women really enjoy. They want libraries, museums, and art galleries closed on the Sabbath. They would abolish the Sunday paper—stop the running of cars and all public conveyances on the holy day, and compel all the people to enjoy sermons, prayers, and psalms.

CLERGY CATER TO THE CONGREGATION.

These dear ministers, when they have poor congregations, thunder against trusts, syndicates, and corporations—against wealth, fashion, and luxury. They tell about Dives and Lazarus, paint rich men in hell, and beggars in heaven. If their congregations are rich they turn their guns in the other direction.

They have no confidence in education—in the development of the brain. They appeal to hopes and fears. They ask no one to think—to investigate. They insist that all shall believe. Credulity is the greatest of virtues, and doubt the deadliest of sins.

These men are the enemies of science—of intellectual progress. They ridicule and calumniate the great thinkers. They deny everything that conflicts with the "sacred scriptures." They still believe in the astronomy of Joshua and the geology of Moses. They believe in the miracles of the past, and deny the demonstrations of the present. They are the foes of facts—the enemies of knowledge. A desire to be happy here, they regard as wicked and worldly, but a desire to be happy in another world as virtuous and spiritual.

Every orthodox church is founded on mistake and falsehood. Every good orthodox minister asserts what he does not know, and denies what he does know.

What are the orthodox clergy doing for the good of mankind?

Absolutely nothing.

What harm are they doing?

On every hand they sow the seeds of superstition. They paralyze the minds, and pollute the imagination of children. They fill their hearts with fear. By their teachings, thousands become insane. With them, hypocrisy is respectable and candor infamous. They enslave the minds of men. Under their teachings men waste and misdirect their energies, abandon the ends that can be accomplished, dedicate their lives to the impossible, worship the unknown, pray to the inconceivable, and become the trembling slaves of a monstrous myth born of ignorance and fashioned by the trembling hands of fear.

Superstition is the serpent that crawls and hisses in every Eden and fastens its poisonous fangs in the hearts of men.

It is the deadliest foe of the human race.

A PLEA FOR HONESTY.

Let us be honest. Let us preserve the veracity of our souls. Let education commence in the cradle—in the lap of the loving mother. This is the first school. The teacher, the mother, should be absolutely honest.

The nursery should not be an asylum for lies.

Parents should be modest enough to be truthful—honest enough to admit their ignorance. Nothing can be taught as true that cannot be demonstrated.

Every child should be taught to doubt, to inquire, to demand reasons. Every soul should defend itself—should be on its guard against falsehood, deceit, and mistake, and should beware of all kinds of confidence men, including those in the pulpit.

Children should be taught to express their doubts, to demand reasons. The object of education should be to develop the brain, to quicken the senses. Every school should be a mental gymnasium. The child should be equipped for the battle of life. Credulity, implicit obedience, are the virtues of slaves and the enslavers of the free. All should be taught that there is nothing too sacred to be investigated, too holy to be understood.

Each mind has the right to lift all curtains, withdraw all veils, scale all walls, explore all recesses, all heights, all depths for itself, in spite of church or priest, or creed or book.

The great volume of Nature should be open to all. None but the intelligent and honest can really read this book. Prejudice clouds and darkens every page. Hypocrisy reads and misquotes, and credulity accepts the quotation. Superstition cannot read a line or spell the shortest word. And yet this volume holds all knowledge, all truth, and is the only source of thought. Mental liberty means the right of all to read this book. Here the Pope and peasant are equal. Each must read for himself, and each ought to honestly and fearlessly give to his fellowmen what he learns.

NATURE THE TRUE TEACHER.

There is no authority in churches or priests, no authority in numbers or majorities. The only authority is Nature, the facts we know. Facts are the masters, the enemies of the ignorant, the servants and friends of the intelligent.

Ignorance is the mother of mystery and misery, of superstition and sorrow, of waste and want.

Intelligence is the only light. It enables us to keep the highway, to avoid the obstructions, and to take advantage of the forces of nature. It is the only lever capable of raising mankind. To develop the brain is to civilize the world. Intelligence reaves the heavens of winged and frightful monsters—drives ghosts and leering fiends from the darkness, and floods with light the dungeons of fear.

All should be taught that there is no evidence of the existence of the supernatural; that the man who bows before an idol of wood or stone is just as foolish as the one who prays to an imagined God; that all worship has for its foundation the same mistake, the same ignorance, the same fear; that it is just as foolish to believe in a personal god as in a personal Devil, just as foolish to believe in great ghosts as little ones.

So all should be taught that the forces, the facts in nature, cannot be controlled or changed by prayer or praise, by supplication, ceremony, or sacrifice; that there is no magic, no miracle; that force can be overcome only by force, and that the whole world is natural.

All should be taught that man must protect himself—that there is no power superior to nature that cares for man—that nature has neither pity nor hatred—that her forces act without the slightest regard for man—that she produces without intention and destroys without regret.

USEFULNESS IS REAL RELIGION.

All should be taught that usefulness is the bud and flower and fruit of real religion. The Popes and Cardinals, the Bishops, priests, and parsons are all useless. They produce nothing. They live on the labor of others. They are parasites that feed on the frightened. They are vampires that suck the blood of honest toil. Every church is an organized beggar. Every one lives on alms—on alms collected by force and fear. Every orthodox church promises heaven and threatens hell, and these promises and threats are made for the sake of alms, for revenue. Every church cries, "Believe and give." A new era is dawning on the world. We are beginning to believe in the religion of usefulness.

The men who felled the forests, cultivated the earth, spanned the rivers with bridges of steel, built railways and canals, the great ships—invented the locomotives and engines, supplying the countless wants of man. The men who invented the telegraphs and cables, and freighted the electric spark with thought and love. The men who invented the looms and spindles that clothe the world, the inventors of printing and the great presses that fill the earth with poetry, fiction, and fact, that save and keep all knowledge for the children yet to be. The inventors of all the wonderful machines whose wheels and levers seem to think and deftly mold from wood and steel the things we use. The men who have explored the heavens and traced the orbits of the stars—who have read the story of the world in mountain range and billowed sea. The men who have lengthened life and conquered pain. The great philosophers and naturalists, who have filled the world with light. The great poets, whose thoughts have charmed the souls, the great painters and sculptors, who have made the canvas speak, the marble live. The great orators, who have swayed the world, the composers, who have given their souls to sound, the captains of industry, the producers, the soldiers who have battled for the right, the vast host of useful men.

TRUE TEACHERS OF MANKIND.

These are our Christs, our apostles, and our saints. The triumphs of science are our miracles. The books filled with the facts of nature are our sacred scriptures, and the force that is in every atom and in every star—in everything that lives and grows and thinks, that hopes and suffers, is the only possible God.

It is impossible to conceive of force without matter.

WHY REMAIN IN IGNORANCE.

You should read Col. Ingersoll's masterly address. You should read Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond's two lectures on "Spiritual Unfoldment" and "The Dwellings of the Dead." You should read about the Roman Octopus and "The Night the Light Went Out," and above all you should read President Barrett's Address before the National Convention of Spiritualists.

GENIUS.

GENIUS THE HIGHEST EMBODIMENT OF MEDIUMSHIP—ANALYZED AND ILLUSTRATED—DIFFERENT KINDS OF GENIUS—EMBODIMENT OF THOUGHT.

Professions in general subserve an augmentation of life. The doctor and surgeon with their surgical instruments, by the removal of pain, the curing of diseases and the setting of broken bones, increase the amount of material life.

Musicians, composers, and performers, as well as professors of music and dancing, are instrumentalities and mediums through and by means of which the emotions and the pleasurable feelings of life are exalted, excited, stimulated and strengthened, and by such exaltation, excitation, stimulation and strengthening life is increased more abundantly. The dancer or the dansense, the poet, the actor and the dramatic composer strengthen and increase life through the arousal of interest in the emotional and sentimental side of life. The sentimental side of human existence needs stimulus as well as the more material and scientific side. Hence the expression: "Man does not live by bread alone." He lives, however, by every word proceeding from the mouth of God. "My words are spirit and they are life."

But what is the Word? And what is meant by proceeding from the mouth of God?

In all natural activities both of intelligent plant and vegetative life and the dynamic energies resultant from specific animal action the Word, or Logos, is made manifest. In the creative thought the Word of Life manifests itself in what I should call the trinity of utility. There is the spoken word, the written word and the word of character or character word. Every man and every woman is writing his or her Book of Life by every thought and action. Every intonation of his voice, every expression of his face, every thought of his mind, every action of his earthly existence, aye, every intention and desire of his heart forms itself into the volume of his character, the Book of his Life, which is divided into chapters, sentences and paragraphs.

To allow illustration: The word of a preacher or spiritual philosopher is kindliness and the acting out in so far as he is able the peculiar doctrines of which he is an oral exponent; the word of a true and upright physician is cure; the word of a conscientious lawyer is equity; the word of an artist, beauty; the word of a woman of fashion is vanity and subserviency to dress; the word of a thief is robbery; the word of a murderer or assassin is death; the word of an upright judge is justice.

Again the historian, the literateur, the scientist and the public instructor, each in his own way augments the value of life and by the increase of such value life itself becomes more full of meaning and more worth the living. So, too, the painter, the sculptor and the architect excite by their products pleasurable perceptions and emotions of the esthetic class; and thus increase life.

But what is the mouth of God? We often find in tracing a word to its primitive or generic meaning that two or more words have outflown from one original root. It is said that the words whisky and water arise from a common origin and the substances often reach a common destination in the human body. So it is with the term God. Trace the word back to its first conception and we will see that God and good were one and the same thing, hence we would say that the mouth of God is nothing more nor less than the source of good and in saying that man lives by every word proceeding from the mouth of God we are only poetically or symbolically speaking of every substantial element in Nature that shall minister to man's animal, intellectual, esthetic, moral and spiritual nature, which in its utility subserving a constructive purpose is through such utility good beyond all question and comes from the source of all good or the mouth of God.

Every man and every woman and every child in the State of California, in the United States of America, nay, in the whole wide world, nay, in every civilization beneath the sun of heaven, nay, more, upon every planet in the whole constellation of worlds, be such people barbaric or savage, semi-savage, semi-civilized or civilized (though civilization has not yet been reached) is in embryo, in germ, a medium of the Word.

It was stated as a fact, a truth authoritative as Divine Law itself, that "the kingdom of heaven is within you." What is heaven? Heaven may be defined as a status or condition toward which each individual entity is moving, toward which all social and sociological ideals are tending. Heaven is a condition where ideas are crystallized into ideals and the practical outworkings of the ideal brings forward the highest state of happiness conceivable to society. Hence our sociological ideals working through the organism of society mean the uplifting and impelling force of constructive social character.

Every individual entity is in form and essence an angel or medium of heaven in his constructive utility, or a devil or medium of hell in his destructive capacity. So by the individualization of his own character he produces heaven or hell wherever he goes.

But the impelling power of man is the rule of the idea, and every man and every woman in so far as they are ruled by that idea are influenced by others, both in this world and the other, toward the propagation of that idea.

Hence man is a medium of propaganda, an embodiment of thought, and in his active career and energetic restlessness he becomes the physical embodiment of thought in motion. It is said that heat is a mode of motion; and I have often thought if hate was not a mode of destructive emotion. For hate is but infernal heat arising from self-love and influenced, strengthened and intensified by the devils in the hells.

Every individual is a medium and in his earthly career stands in equilibrium between the heavens and the hells to become a media of correspondence for the devils of Inferno or the angels of Paradise; to become a criminal interested in the destruction of society, or a higher exponent of civilization desirous of helping the world to a greater appreciation of the true, the good and the beautiful.

So genius to my mind is the highest embodiment of mediumship—spiritual mediumship if his genius be to make the world better; infernal mediumship if it tend to make the world worse.

What is genius? Genius may be divided into two classes; the scientific genius and the artistic genius. Genius is individuality clothed with great creative power and possessed of great imagination. A genius is a man of concentration, a being of consecration—consecration to thought-construction and hence to the growth of thought and the cultivation of the ideas in others.

Philosophy, however, differentiates between the ideal of art and that of science, the former being an ideal of form, having for its end and aim the pleasurable sense of enjoyment, while the ideal of science and philosophy is an ideal of matter and content, having for its end and aim the sense of utility.

To my mind William Shakespeare, the Bard of Avon, is of all beings the greatest artistic medium the world has ever known; and Thomas A. Edison, the American inventor, is the greatest scientific medium of this or any other age so far as our knowledge of mediumship extends. It is said that Edison gets a clue to many of his inventions during the sleep hour.

That genius is the highest phase of mediumship may be seen by citations from history. It is said that Socrates, the Greek philosopher, was always accompanied by his demon; and Luther flung his inkpot at what he considered to be the Devil, but which was in reality a spirit.

If one will look back upon the pages of the world's history he will notice that the imposition of some one idea (of which a great genius or medium has become the embodiment) has been forced upon the people through the genius of his character and the power of his greatness.

Every individual is an embodiment of thought; but a genius is the embodiment of some one thought or series of thoughts, to the exclusion of every other thought, idea or aspiration.

Of some of our great musicians it has been said that they thought of naught but music, they had no idea unless it was expressed in musical sounds, even becoming slovens in dress, unmannerly in temper, often forgetting the needs of the physical body in the way of meat and drink because of the absorption of their idea.

A genius is more or less of a discoverer. In the inventive and business genius of to-day we see mediumship most highly developed along a material plane; and in so far as it tends to the destruction of the higher moral forces, as it too often does, we lose the higher conception of genius in its utility of construction. As a race we are intelligent; but intelligence and intellectuality does not necessarily imply morality. In fact, the greatest criminals in all this world are very often the most intellectual people in the world. Paradoxical as it may seem, a man may be highly developed intellectually and at the same time a moral idiot. On the other hand some of the worst ignoramuses we have seen have been very highly developed morally. But when an individual becomes highly developed physically, intellectually and morally then he becomes an angel of light to others, a radiating center of influence for good, a genius, a medium, a leader and a savior in the highest and best sense of the word.

Again, in the mediumship of such a genius we see the moral and spiritual aristocracy come to the front, instead of, as now, the financial and intellectual aristocrats of the world assuming dictatorial powers.

Man has in him latent and undeveloped possibilities which, aroused into action, may be potential for good or ill—may wake him into life as a criminal monstrosity whose deeds shock human society and thrill the mind of sensitive people with fear and loathing—monstrosities such as Durant, H. H. Holmes, and Zuka, the New York pyromaniac; or he may awake into the activity of a giant, the genius of a god. Of such elements are all reformers made.

The genius is simply the individual medium standing alone and isolated upon a solitary mountain peak of the spiritual Himalayas and showing to eyes not blinded by prejudice nor prevented by the selfishness of lustful greed, what the race might rise to if it would.

The test medium is the earth upon which is built the various manifestations of phenomena from which comes into active life the philosophic arcana. But the genius is the medium of power, the medium of aggressive usefulness, the medium that addresses a world "dead in trespasses and sins" and by the force of his character, the power of his soul, the gigantic attainments of his life, compels the world to listen, admire, hear, and at last, obey him. For the true genius is the highest type of mediumship. He is the medium of mediums. He is the heaven above the earth toward which all lesser thoughts are climbing. He is an angel of light showing unto others the way to tread. He is a messenger of joy to others. "Beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth tidings of great joy." With the Christ of Nazareth associated with him in the Brotherhood of Truth he can most truly say: "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life."

STRIVING TO SUPPRESS LIBERTY IN NEBRASKA.

To the Editor:—The present Legislature of this State has introduced a medical bill that, if passed, will be the most stringent and barbarous law in any State in the Union. This bill provides for an Examining Board, which provides that the Board shall consist of M. D.s of the following schools:

One Allopath, one Homeopath and one Eclectic, who has practiced medicine in the State not less than seven years. Any liberal minded person can readily see the object of this bill; only these three schools are to be recognized. The doctors claim the bill is for higher education, and to prevent the quacks and skum of other States settling in Nebraska.

This bill was drafted by the Allopath Medical Society of Lincoln, and introduced by Senator Lee, and after its second reading was referred to the Committee on Medical Societies. It reported favorably and recommended that the bill pass. This Senate Committee consists of the following individuals: Senator Grothan, M. D.; Senator Watson, M. D., Senator Dearing, M. D., Senator Conaway, M. D., and Senator Haller, drugist.

One week ago yesterday the bill came up on special order, and at least one hundred M. D.s were in attendance on this occasion, and were given the privilege of the senate chamber during the discussion of the bill. I stood alone in the fight, showing the intent of this law, and finally succeeded in getting the bill referred back to the committee; but this committee is again urging that this bill become a law. It seems that I am destined to fight this battle alone. There is now a Sunday bill pending in the house, that is about as unjust as the medical bill in the senate. I expect to attack this bill to-day and defeat it, if possible. It provides for fine and imprisonment for violation of the day commonly known as the Lord's day. Patrick Henry has well said, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." I appeal to the liberal minded readers to assist me a little financially to continue this fight for justice and liberty. Address all letters to 340 So. 20th St., Lincoln, Nebraska.

AN INTERESTING STUDY OF OBSESSION.

ANESTHESIA FRACTURES CONSCIOUSNESS—SEEMINGLY SPLITTING IT INTO MANY CURIOUS SECTIONS—THE MANIA FOR PECULATION IN AN HONEST MAN—PROOF THAT IT WAS INDUCED BY AN UNFRIENDLY SPIRIT—PHENOMENA THROUGH HYPNOTISM DIRECTED BY FRENCH SCIENTISTS OF EMINENCE.

"Many years ago our family was acquainted with a gentleman, Josiah Lamb, who, although striving to live a strictly moral life fell into criminal practices in spite of himself, says the Cincinnati Enquirer. My father felt sure that this was the case with Lamb, but the law at that time, took no heed of psychologic influence, and medicine was just beginning to awaken to its existence, not by any means to its importance; consequently the man was rigorously dealt with by Courts and people. He protested that he was a transgressor without intent or motive to do a wrongful act, but was without the power to resist an inner suggestion—the promptings by that agency called the hidden self. He owned a small farm, was industrious and frugal, lived within his means and gave his children a good practical education; but it was impossible for him to keep his hands off portable property. He stole everything he could get away with, mostly tools, implements and gear for which he had no use and dared not sell, even had he a disposition to so dispose of it. It became evident that he did not steal for gain. Many articles he returned within a day or two of the theft and made humble

APOLOGY TO THE OWNERS.

"One cold Sunday a maiden lady, familiarly known in the neighborhood as Aunt Hepzeba Speer, was greatly annoyed at the close of church services by the mysterious absence of her cloak. She had worn it to church as a needful guard against the chilly atmosphere, hung it over the back of her pew as usual, and now she needed it no less to wrap her spare body on the way home. How could its disappearance be accounted for?

"The name of the general utility man in the church was Anson Downs. He was sexton, janitor, pew opener and engineer of the fiery furnace in the basement, and he had noticed, on the particular Sunday when this incident occurred, that Josiah Lamb had occupied the pew immediately behind that in which Miss Speer nodded through the sermon. The reflection following this thought in Anson's mind would have been natural to almost anyone who was intimate with Lamb, and the faithful man addressed the bereaved lady in soothing tones.

"'I'll look for your cloak' said he, 'Like's not it's bin took by mistake, but if I find it you're not to do anythin' to anybody for ear'in' it off.'

"'Indeed, I will if it's been took by a thief,' said Miss Hepzeba, with a toss of the head. 'Toughter be hanging, at least, to steal a good cloak out'n a church.'

"'If you want me to manage the thing,' responded Anson; 'you have to come down from that idee. There's no thief in the business, an' if I git yer cloak here in half a hour you're to ask no questions. On jest these terms I'll go out on a scoot, but on any other I won't go a step.'

"'Well, go along.'

"'You agree to what I ask?'

"'Yes, if you get the cloak.'

"Anson started, but at the door he met Lamb, with Miss Speer's cloak on his arm. He had come back to restore the property to its owner. When she he answered that appearances were against him, and positively he did not intend to steal, but something forced him to take that cloak, and he had had a hard fight with something before he could retrace his steps to restore it to its owner. He begged forgiveness.

"'That's easily asked for,' said the lady, 'but not so easy to give. D'you come to church to steal?'

"'Certainly not.'

"'It'll have to be looked into by the Magistrate.'

"'No it will not,' interposed Downs, 'onless you want to be arrested for falsehood. I'll hold you to your word, Miss Speer.'

"'An' let the thief go?'

"'I'll hold you to your word, I say.'

"The matter had to be dropped, for Miss Hepzeba Speer could not think of appearing in court under the accusation threatened by Anson, although she was more than willing to prosecute Lamb, if permitted. I give this incident to show how the man's mania developed these remarkable features, and the large charity exercised toward him by those who knew him best. But he practiced his besetting inclination upon strangers sometimes, and then he had more than trouble enough. For instance, a pack peddler remained at his house over night on one occasion, and Joseph robbed the man of a large lot of valuable goods. In the morning the pack was examined by its owner and the goods were missed just as the temporary appropriator was entering the room to restore them. The peddler was one of those rigid, flint-lock, brass-mounted Yankees who had but one name for a spade, and he was prompt in causing Lamb's arrest on the charge of robbery.

THE CULPRIT CONFESSED

his crime and he was duly sentenced to serve two years in the penitentiary—the minimum penalty.

"A real thief is invariably a liar. The crimes of thievery and mendacity are twins, and promenade up and down the world in close communion; but Lamb told the truth under all circumstances, no matter how seriously he might be involved by the result. Sometimes, when certain effects of people in his neighborhood were missing, and he gave a negative reply when asked if he knew anything of their whereabouts, his statement was always taken for truth, especially after many events had tested his veracity. Unfortunately for him, however, his responses were usually in the affirmative, and then he lost no time in restoring the missing property. If the person despoiled was an old acquaintance who understood the man's weakness, rarely was legal action taken. But there was a small public house half a mile from Lamb's, at which travelers were entertained when they had business in the vicinity. This was a popular place of resort for everybody in the community, and especially a favorite harbor for our friend with

PECULATING IMPULSES.

It was there that most of his unfortunate adventures befell, for here he 'converted' saddles, bridles, whips, overcoats, blankets, even hats, and bore them away to his home. True, most of these things were returned before need arose for their use, but the ordinary wayfarer has supreme hatred of a thief, and most of these people despoiled carried the prosecution of the culprit to the utmost limit of the law. The man was incarcerated more than half the time.

"Six or seven years ago Dr. Minshall was a guest at this roadside inn. He was fresh from the great medical schools of Europe and especially interested in hypnotism, in the investigation and study of which he had consulted Charcot and Janet in France and Stumpfel in Austria. Lamb appropriated a small pocket-case of Minshall's instruments and returned them with apologies before they were missed. The doctor asked why they were taken and so promptly returned, Lamb could only say that the act was performed under an irresistible impulse which he could not explain; that he had no possible use for the instruments and did not want to take them, but was compelled to do so and more to the same effect. He did not hope to be believed, but Minshall saw truth in the man's eye and in his manner. He took stock of Josiah Lamb and gave him confidence, telling him that he was not a criminal but the victim of which probably could be removed. This view of the matter was novel to those who heard it and remarkably gratifying to its subject. He was willing to submit to anything necessary for the eviction of a something which invariably strove to defeat his better motives.

"Instead of two days, which was the limit of Minshall's intention for remaining in the neighborhood, he stayed five weeks—part of the time as the guest of my father, from whom I derive these particulars—and in this period he found Lamb one of the most ready hypnotic subjects he had ever seen. His case was easily diagnosed in the third trance, when the controlling influence of the man took charge of his organism. It proved to be the spirit of one of Lamb's boyish schoolmates, an inveterate pilferer, upon whom the victim had informed when a serious theft was committed. This thief died young, and from motives of revenge his spirit overcame Lamb's easy nature and induced him to steal everything he could lay his hands on. Taking full possession of the man in this trance, he detailed with much glee the many annoying embarrassments he had brought upon him.

"'And they would have been much worse,' added the baleful spirit, 'if the poor fool had not been soft hearted, making him repent, take the plunder back and own up to the steal. This nonsense always happened after I had to go away.'

"'Why did you have to go away?'

"'Lamb's disposition would change so quickly, without notice, that it expelled me.'

"'That is, his better nature would triumph over your foul suggestion.'

"'Anyway you please. You may have the right idea.'

"'Yes; and now you are to be kept away altogether.'

"'How?'

"'All your approaches will be resisted by Lamb and myself.'

"'By you too? Why do you interfere in a matter outside of your own business?'

"'It is my business in many senses as a physician and humanitarian, and I command you to vacate that organism on pain of utter destruction. Out!'

"Lamb awoke immediately and spoke of a feeling of relief. He was considerably depressed

PREVIOUS TO THE TRANCE.

Minshall informed him of what had taken place, and he recalled his old schoolmate and related many incidents of his sad delinquency. He also said that never before could he account for the fact that always, when in the act of pilfering, the name of this mischievous lad had entered his mind. Now it would no longer perplex him.

"The unfriendly spirit made five attacks upon Lamb after this declared opposition of Dr. Minshall to his presence, but the obsession was never complete. By suggestion the doctor induced Lamb to make a vigorous fight against the unhallowed power, and the conflicts were so fierce that the victim of long obsession was wholly exhausted on two occasions before the doctor could awaken him. Finally, the obsessing influence succumbed, acknowledged defeat and has never returned; and Lamb, now the affliction under which he labored is understood, has the hearty sympathy and deep respect of all his neighbors, many of whom have contributed liberally to his prosperity. He has become financially independent and his old age is cheered by peace and plenty.

"This is another illustration of the fact that the secret springs of crime are frequently quite foreign from the agent employed in their commission. We say that a criminal who is apparently demented must have been driven out of his mind.

Where does so apt an expression arise? Thucydides used its equivalent in 443 B. C., apparently as a quotation, but the ancient Greeks expressed no general ideas upon the SUBJECT OF OBSESSION.

Still it is older than the Greeks, for men and women were driven out of their minds by trespassing spirits anterior to historical record, and then these spirits worked their own will through the organism of those they had dispossessed. Why shut out so large a theme from popular psychology?

"MM. Bernheim and Pitres report through M. Janet a series of interesting experiments. They induced the banker, Gilott, when entranced to write a check to his own order for 100,000 francs, and then the suggestion was made that upon awakening he should order it payable, by indorsement, to M. Pitres, without indentification. When he awoke he asked for pen and ink, both of which had been carefully secreted. For what purpose? He studied a moment and then announced that he must endorse a check without delay. For how much? One hundred thousand francs. To whom was he paying so large a sum? Why, to M. Pitres. Did he owe him so much? He thought so. Yes, it must be true that he did. Pen and ink were supplied and the banker made the indorsement exactly as suggested to his subconsciousness. Then the matter was explained and the check destroyed, thus obliterating the hypnotic effect, but from this instance it is easy to see the wrong which might be perpetrated upon innocent men by designing hypnotists. A capitalist whose name is withheld was induced by a similar process to forge the name of another rich man to a note for a large sum, and the impression was so fixed upon his mind by suggestion that the document was made for value received that it required all the art of the hypnotists to induce him to destroy it upon awakening. They were even compelled to resort to threats of arrest.

"These gentlemen have been indefatigable in scientific observation and among other things have made that hysterical blindness is no blindness at all. The eye of an hysteric which is totally blind when the other, the good eye, is shut, will do its share of vision perfectly well when both eyes are open together. Even when both eyes are semi-blind from hysterical disease, the method of automatic writing proves that their perceptions exist, only cut off from communication with the upper consciousness.

M. Binet has found the hand of his patients unconsciously writing down words which their eyes were vainly endeavoring to see—that is, to bring to the upper consciousness. Of course, their submerged consciousness was seeing them, else the hand could not have written as it did. Similarly the subconscious self perceives colors which the hysterically color blind eyes cannot bring to the normal consciousness. Pricks, burns, and pinches upon the anesthetic skin, all unnoticed by the upper self, are recollected to have been suffered and complained of as soon as the under self gets a chance to express itself by the passage of the subject into hypnotic trance.

"Therefore it follows that at least in certain persons the total possible consciousness may be split into parts which co-exist but mutually ignore each other and share the objects of knowledge between them. Give an object to one of the consciousnesses and by this act you remove it from the others. Except a certain common fund of information like the command of language, what the upper self knows the under self is ignorant of, and vice versa. M. Janet proved this conclusively in Lucie. In her trance he covered her lap with numbered cards, then told her that upon waking she should not see any card whose number was a multiple of three. This is the ordinary so-called for which Lucie was a well adapted subject. When she was awakened and asked about the papers on her lap, she counted and picked up only those whose number was not a multiple of three. To 9, 12, 18, 24 she was blind. But her hand, when the subconscious self was interrogated by the usual method of engrossing the upper self in another conversation, wrote that the only cards in her lap were those numbered 9, 12, 18, 24, etc.; and upon being asked to pick up all the cards, picked up these and gave the others no notice.

"When the sight of certain things was suggested to the subconscious Lucie, the normal Lucie suddenly became partially or totally blind. 'What is the matter? I cannot see!' the normal personage suddenly cried out in the midst of her conversation, when M. Janet whispered to the secondary personage to make use of her eyes. The anesthesias, paralysis, contractions and other irregularities from which hysterics suffer seem then to be due to the fact that their secondary personage has enriched itself by robbing the primary state of a function which the latter ought to have retained. The curative indication is evident, to wit: Get at the secondary personage by hypnotization, or in whatever other way is found possible, and make the patient surrender the eye, the skin, the arm, or whatever the affected part may be. The normal self thereupon regains possession, sees, feels, and is ABLE TO MOVE AGAIN.

"In this way M. Jules Janet cured the well-known subject, Witt, of all sorts of afflictions which, until he discovered the secret of her deeper trance, it had been difficult to subdue. 'Stop your mischievous jokes,' he said to the secondary self, and the latter obeyed and surrendered to the normal person those things which of right were hers. The manner in which the various personages share the stock of possible sensations between them is amusingly illustrated in the case of this woman. When awake her skin is everywhere insensible except on a zone about the arm where she habitually wears a gold bracelet. This zone has feeling, but in the deeper trance when all the rest of the body feels, this particular zone becomes absolutely anesthetic. Often the mutual ignorance of the selves leads to incidents which are strange enough. The acts and movements performed by the subconscious self are withdrawn from the conscious condition and the subject will do all sorts of incongruous things quite unaware of their absurdity. M. Janet orders Lucie by the method of 'distraction,' as he calls it, to make a pied de nez, and her hands go forthwith to the end of her nose. When asked what she is doing she replies that she is doing nothing, and continues for a long time talking with no apparent suspicion that her fingers are constantly moving in front of her nose. She is made to walk about the room, when she continues to talk, believing that she is STILL SITTING DOWN.

"In a man with delirium tremens M. Janet observed similar acts. While the physician was questioning him by whispered suggestion M. Janet made him walk, sit, kneel and even lie with his face downward upon the floor, he all the while believing himself to be standing beside his bed. An account like this seems incredible till one sees it. Long ago, without understanding it, I witnessed a small example of the way in which a person's knowledge may be shared by the two selves. A young lady who had been writing automatically was sitting with a pencil in her hand trying to recall, at my request, the name of a gentleman she had once seen. She could recollect only the first syllable. Her hand meanwhile, without her knowledge, wrote down the last two syllables.

"In a perfectly healthy young man who writes with the planchette I lately found the hand to be entirely anesthetic during the writing act. It could be pricked severely without the subject knowing the fact. However, the planchette accused me in strong terms of hurting the hand. Pricks on the non-writing hand, meanwhile, which awakened strong protest from the young gentleman's vocal organs, were denied to exist by the self which operated the planchette.

"You ask how I am going to connect these various phenomena with obsession, and what relation they have to the general subject of Spiritualism. When we have another talk these and cognate matters will be explained to the best of my understanding."

OLD HYMN TRANSPOSED.

To the Editor:—While Mrs. Levi Wood was engaged about the housework, she was induced by some progressive mind to transpose the good old hymn that used to be sung with vim in the good old days of early Methodism:

When I can read my title clear
To truth's celestial skies,
I'll bid farewell to every fear,
And wipe my joyful eyes.

No earth against this soul engage,
No fiery darts be hurled,
Then we'll smile in progression's age
And face a loving world.

No cares like a wild deluge come,
No storms of sorrow fall,
For love and peace dwell in ev'ry home,
And God is all in all.

Then I will bathe this joyful soul
In seas of Progression's rest,
And not a wave of sorrow roll,
Over this gladdened breast.

"The Philosophy of Spirit, and the Spirit-World." By Hudson Tuttle. A most able and interesting presentation of a most important subject. Every Spiritualist and every inquirer into the proofs and philosophy of Spiritualism should have this excellent book. Cloth, $1. For sale at this office.

TRUE BLUE.

ALLIE LINDSAY LYNCH EXPRESSES HER OPINION ON VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

To the Editor:—Evidently there are some Spiritualists who intend to remain true blue, and who have sound backbones. If "worst comes to worst," as the saying goes, these radical brave souls can withdraw as heretics, and organize a new crusade, and hold aloft the banner of truth with its grand name—Spiritualism—which some of us care not to associate with either the old (Christianity) or the latest fad (Theosophy), nor to class as a religion of any kind.

I wish that every one of your readers, who yet have a little courage in their make up, would carefully read "Solon and Mary," the inspirational story now running in your paper. How correctly depicted is re-incarnation as a hydra-headed monster, and how plain is shown the true God—the soul will power. A good many other truths are made plain in this excellent story, and I can easily believe Solon and Mary are reliable reporters, using an unfolded brain of mortal as their amanuensis. I trust this story may come out in book form and its lessons be preserved for future ages.

Let more of our radical workers sound the bugle call that it may be seen that we are not as scarce as hen's teeth. Perhaps the bill to license mediums so heavily here in Chicago will tend to stir some who have leaned toward untaxed Christianity. What errors truth has ever had to combat, and how few are worthy followers of its light. And right here I desire to say that Spiritualists who refute the savior theory, do a wrong to humor spirits in their request for favorite songs that teach a savior in their wording. How little is given to these points, and how prone are mortals still to think a spirit is bound to be a wise angel! and this is the way they are led backward, to the church fold; for orthodox spirits are as plentiful and in error, as those who yet are mortals. I think there is more obsession for this cause than to commit crimes—unless we may consider it a crime to be followers of olden traditions that reason scorns! Reason sees no need of a blood atonement. Neither will those who think much upon this error, permit their guides to remain so beclouded in intellect. We can teach the spirits, even as the more advanced of spirit life may be instructors for us. Let mediums do their duty to those who come as guides, nor humor whims in them. I should refuse a guide's request for orthodox songs, and ask a priest or nun to withdraw or remove their robes that thus mark them devoted still to error. Those who do not may expect to fall victims and drift away from Spiritualism back to the church. I am sure I never will.

ALLIE LINDSAY LYNCH.

LIGHT—SOUND—SMELL.

To the Editor:—I notice in your paper an article criticising an article in a previous paper. The Critic claims there is no sound unless heard, no sight unless seen, no scent unless smelled. Is there no sound in mid-ocean when a thunder storm is raging there? Is there no light in the Mammoth Cave if a burning lamp has been left there and all eyes have left? Or if a person takes a quantity of musk into a room and scatters it about and then leaves, is there no scent in the room because there is no one to smell it? These he claims are sensations, which I admit as far as impression on the mind exists, but there are actions also between them and the object seen or heard. According to his idea there is no seeing or hearing, no properties to produce that action, and as that is what they do, there are no eyes, no ears. Light is the consequent of chemical change, now if light is not, the change is not; and the chemicals that produce it are gone also. Now the seeing must come out in the dark, without cause, to create the light so it can see it; then the light comes forth like a bashful maiden to be seen by the sight. This theory brings the cause the consequent of the effect, when we know that the effect has no influence over the cause. This way of theorizing is the outcome of Plato's special hobby, his "Idealism;" this theory is to collect ideas by imagination, compound them and form a theory and bend all parts to it; such a theory with so great a man in knowledge, and in kindness a well-wisher to all (read his "Republic") and his greatness in all things would do but little harm. This was shown incorrect by his own teachings otherwise, but he never confessed it. It was also shown by Aristotle—whose great base was realism—staying nearly twenty years with him, until Plato's death, and of whom Plato said he was the intellect of the school.

This theory was the favorite one of the religious class of that day, and no doubt saved Plato from sharing the fate of Socrates, for he pleaded long and hard to save Socrates' life, and also for the preservation of his writings, while those of Democrates Aristotle, Epicurus and those like them were destroyed.

This theory is the favorite among the religious class of to-day, also the professional and that class that think themselves so learned that they are fit associates of the high class. I should not have thought that Underwood would have adopted idealism—he has been so strong a materialist—but it is said evil communications corrupt good morals. This class think themselves wise because they can explain these theories so the people will think them learned and great, and believe what they say without any proof, though they understand nothing.

Sarsaparilla Sense.

Any sarsaparilla is sarsaparilla. True. So any tea is tea. So any flour is flour. But grades differ. You want the best. It's so with sarsaparilla. There are grades. You want the best. If you understood sarsaparilla as well as you do tea and flour it would be easy to determine. But you don't. How should you? When you are going to buy a commodity whose value you don't know, you pick out an old established house to trade with, and trust their experience and reputation. Do so when buying sarsaparilla.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla has been on the market 50 years. Your grandfather used Ayer's. It is a reputable medicine. There are many Sarsaparillas—but only one Ayer's. It cures.

Superstition in all Ages

Or "Le Bon Sens,"

By JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years in France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and asked God's pardon for having taught the Christian religion. He left this volume as his last will and testament to his parishioners and to the world. Translated from the French original by Miss Anna Knoop.

Post 8vo., 339 pages, with portrait. Cloth, $1.00; postage, 14 cents.

"The work of the honest pastor is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind that the last century produced. . . . Paine and Voltaire had reserves, but Jean Meslier had none. He keeps nothing back; and yet, after all, the wonder is not that there should have been one priest who left that testimony at his death, but that all priests do not."—James Parton.

DRIVE WHERE THEY SHOULD LEAD.

A correspondent of the Free Press, published at Singapore, after visiting the Hawaiian islands, communicated to that journal his impressions of missionary rule. He made no mention of the shrinking of the native population from 150,000, as the missionaries found them in 1820, when they commenced their Christianizing process, to 31,000, as shown in a recent census; but he does discourse on the present rule of the sons of those gospel venders rather discouragingly. We quote:

"They make too much of their success, and endeavor to drive where they should lead. That is the complaint of the lay element in Honolulu against the present missionaries, who still have predominating influence in the affairs of the Republic. They are drawing the strings too tight; they are emulating the Puritanical tyranny of the Commonwealth in England, and of Calvin in Geneva. The result is bound to be disastrous, and disastrous most of all to the cause they are anxious to serve. As an illustration, let me repeat part of a conversation with a Honolulu citizen. He asked me for information on some local point. I confessed myself a stranger. 'And how do you like being in heaven?' he asked. 'We call this place heaven, because it's chockful of missionaries—yes, sir, it's a happy place. The man with the longest face gets on best. It's church in the morning, church at noon, and church at night,' he continued. 'Always church, and no amusements. Only church and the saloon. But if you go to the saloon they won't have you in the church, and if you go to the church, they won't have you—well, I guess they'll take you in the saloon, wherever you come from. The saloon is freer than the church in this place, for all we have so much of it. The holy terror prevails in this land.'

"Hearing so much about the missionaries, I went to service on Sunday. The preacher gave his hearers a bright, if somewhat old-fashioned sermon. But his prayers struck me as closely resembling the language of an office-seeker addressing a president with prize positions in his gifts."

PLAGIARISMS.

When President Polk sent in his message to Congress in 1846, declaring "war exists against the United States by act of Mexico," Hon. Thomas Corwin, then a member of that body from Ohio, denounced the condition of things in unmeasured terms. Said he:

"If I were a Mexican, as I am an American, I would welcome your armies to the soil of Mexico with bloody hands and to hospitable graves."

We had annexed the "Lone Star State," Texas, to the American Union while yet claimed as an integral province of the Mexican republic. The Whig party, with Henry Clay at its head, had opposed that measure, claiming that until Mexico should relinquish its right to that domain, no other government had a right to intervene, much more claim it as its own. But a history of that event, and of those times are not the motives of this article, but to show that Corwin borrowed, substantially, his expression so universally condemned by the opposition, from a speech made by Wm. Pitt, afterwards Earl of Chatham, in the British Parliament, on November 18, 1777, on American affairs. Said the British orator:

"If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop remains in my country, I never would lay down my arms. Never, never, NEVER!"

This speech was published in the Columbian Orator, the school book in use in this country when Corwin was at school, and it was there we found it the other day and learned the source of the orator's inspiration.

Trace to their source the many good things constantly floating through the press, or falling from the lips of public speakers, and we are shocked with the evidences of their plagiarisms. An examination of the school books to which they had access would reveal the origin of many of the orator's most witty and brilliant expressions.

A GOOD THING.

At the instance of Rev. A. C. Dixon, New York, the ministers of that famed city have determined to boycott the Academy of Music, and every other hall where Col. Ingersoll shall be permitted to address the public. Now that is a good thing. It shows who is hurt by the Colonel's facts; but a great public speaker on whom thousands wait to listen to his eloquence and logic, was never silenced by such methods. Ingersoll is reported to have said that "Dixon's refusal to make his accustomed noise" in places where he has lectured is simply laughable. God & Co. in the Constitution, followed by a revival of the Inquisition, may silence adverse criticism on the doings of that ancient firm and their friends, but nothing short of that can stay the tide of knowledge which is rolling inland, and is sure to engulf the errors of the earlier ages.

A BURNING SHAME.

"It is a burning shame that to be a downright Christian debars from the favor of the people." So said Rev. Wm. B. Leach, in his semi-patriotic discourse on Washington, at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church, Chicago, on the evening of the 21st ult., as reported in the Chronicle the next day.

An inquirer has no occasion to go far, or prolong his search, to find why the facts are as the reverend gentleman stated. To be a "downright Christian," such as his creed makes him, is to believe and make practical by example, sustained by his habits and conversation, that he alone is an heir of heaven; that all who do not indorse his creed are doomed to banishment from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power through the wasteless ages of eternity. He thinks himself right and all others wrong. In short, he is a first-class bigot, narrow in his conceptions, selfish in his purposes, with a pharisaical "I am holier than thou," if not expressed in words, always shown in his manner; and of course the people don't like him. And should they be blamed for it?

Rev. Leach said further along: "Inject the Christ into our politics and how soon the wilderness would blossom as the rose."

All through the Middle Ages, from the time Constantine embraced Christianity, about A. D. 322, and made it the religion of the Roman empire, down to the Reformation, a period of a thousand years, Christ was dominant in politics. Then came wars of the most gigantic character. Then flourished the Crusades; then Jews and Mohammedans were mercilessly massacred by millions; then priestcraft was triumphant; then the Inquisition was in its glory; then witches and heresy were punished with death; then indulgences to commit all manner of crimes were sold in the open market. And these great crimes against humanity made the church what it is to-day, whether represented by Catholics or Protestants. Oh, those were God-fearing, Christ-worshiping and church-adoring times; but racks, and tortures, and fires of green wood to burn recalcitrants and protract their sufferings, somehow did not meet with the "favor of the people," and we suspicion it will be a long time before these weapons of "downright Christianity" will come again into popular favor.

A DESTRUCTIVE ADMISSION.

Chas. W. Hutson, professor of modern languages and acting professor of history in the University of Mississippi, published a few years ago a book entitled "The Beginning of Civilization." In his introduction he informed his readers that the work was the substance of lectures to his classes, and that he drew upon the geologists, the archaeologists, and the students of myths and folk-lore for his facts. On page 21 he makes the following interesting admission:

"I have referred to the Hebrew Scriptures as historical evidence. It is well that we should come to some clear understanding about their authority. Let me remind you that, when the statements of the Bible are produced in evidence on any point in the study of history, they are not weighted with any theological authority, but are to be considered just as is any other documentary evidence; and we are to test them by the same rules of criticism."

The proposition is a correct one. What, then, becomes of the whole collection in the hands of an honest inquirer? The Pentateuch first disappears, with the story of creation, a universal deluge, the confusion of language, all the adventures of Abraham and his posterity; the whole historical past must give way to criticisms; the romances and miracles all are worthless, and the prophecies carry on their face the evidence that they were written long after the events transpired.

Prof. Hutson is unquestionably a churchman. He would not occupy the place he does in a Southern university were he not orthodox, but he has furnished a powerful weapon against the integrity of the book on which all Christians build their faith.

UNDER NEW NAMES.

The Encyclopedia Britannica, article Crusader, incidentally stated a valuable truth when mentioning the rise of Christianity. It said:

"The Christian converts in Rome, in Corinth, in Athens and Alexandria, had been worshipers of the Capitoline Jupiter, or the Olympian Zeus, of Isis and Osiris, of Phoebus, Artemis, or Mithras."

Yes, we find those converts to Christianity continuing, practically, the worship of the same gods, with scarcely a variation, save in name. Jupiter of the Romans, and Zeus of the Greeks appear as the Supreme God, while Isis and her son Horus do duty in the new religion as Mary and Jesus. The characteristics of Phoebus, otherwise Apollo, and Mithras are blended with the Christ. And so Artemis, better known under the Roman name Diana, is molded into Mary, the mother of God. These gods and goddesses, as many others, such as Aesculapius, the healer, and Bacchus, the god of wine, are merged into the Christian system, carrying along with them the ancient holy days and festivals, with substantially the same modes of worship, changed a little, save in name and in the intolerance of all other forms of faith which became a distinguishing feature in the new religion, as it was not in the original.

A ROBUST LIE.

A strong, vigorous, healthful lie, such as does regular service when a good orthodox brother wishes to crush an opponent, is always entitled to consideration, because it is no ordinary lie, and its purpose is apparent on its face. The Christian Herald had one of these in its service some time ago, which is entitled to the first prize, if robust lies take premiums. It had a wood cut representing Paine, whose religion was "to do good," screaming in bed, his nurse fleeing from the room in terror, while under the pictured lie was the lying legend: "Thomas Paine, the infidel, in his last moments howled with so much terror that his nurse fled from the room."

Thomas Paine, were he living to-day, and inculcating the same religious views he did a hundred years ago, would be classed as a conservative Unitarian, possibly a Spiritualist, if some of his statements were taken in account. His great offense against the church: He did not believe that a virgin had ever given birth to a God, and he absolutely ridiculed the idea. This made him a very naughty man, even if "his pen did more for the freedom of America than did the sword of Washington."

Never think that God's delays are God's denials. Hold on; hold fast; hold out. Patience is genius.—Buffon.

A TREMENDOUS REVOLUTION.

Thoughts that are Worthy of Careful Consideration, as Expressed by a Leading Daily, The New York Sun.

We have received many more letters discussing and defending the attitude of Dr. Lyman Abbott toward supernatural religion, but it is not necessary that we should publish them, since they merely repeat arguments to which we have already given a place in the "Sun."

They all miss the point, which is that if there is not supernatural authority for Christianity it becomes simply a system of moral philosophy, regarding whose soundness disagreement is justifiable and inevitable. If it is not believed in as coming from God by supernatural revelation, but is treated as simply human in its origin, it will be criticised on its merits alone, as the Jews, for instance, criticise it, and as it was criticised by the Romans. The Romans opposed the Christian system and tried to destroy it as essentially inimical to the state and the established social order. They viewed the Christians and dealt with them as we now regard and treat Anarchists. If, then, the supernatural origin and character of Jesus are denied, his teachings will be examined in light radically different from that in which their discussion has proceeded hitherto. They will cease to be the foundation of a religion imposing an obligation of belief as essential to obedience to God, and become debatable propositions made by a human teacher of philosophy, and therefore properly and necessarily examinable to determine their intrinsic value.

This would make a complete revolution in the spirit of Christendom. Christianity as a religious system would be wholly subverted. Instead of a religion deriving its authority from a supernatural source, whe should have only a religious philosophy limited by the inability of the human intellect to go beyond this world of sense and fact. Jesus would be relegated to the plane of Buddha and Mohammed, and the Biblical stories of supernatural occurrences would take their place along with the tales of Greek and Roman, Assyrian and Egyptian mythology. Nothing would be left for man except the guidance of human reason alone. The foundation upon which the church and Christian theology are built, would be swept away absolutely.

It is this destruction in which Dr. Abbott and his defenders are now engaged. If the Biblical story of Jonah and the whale is to be regarded as purely a parable, an allegory, whose actual occurrence was impossible and therefore unbelievable, Christianity must descend from its exaltation as a religion of divine authority, and drop to the level of a system of religious philosophy or speculation, of human authorship. If the story of Jonah is merely allegorical, a fable, every other Biblical tale, from the creation of Adam and Eve up to the supernatural birth and resurrection of Jesus, is likewise allegorical, for they conflict equally with the possibilities under merely natural law. In other words, the arguments of Dr. Abbott and his defenders shatter the whole fabric of religion built by faith, and put the scriptural reports of supernatural occurrences in the same category with the tales of mythology.

This is a conclusion which the theologians of the school of Dr. Abbott try to avoid, with a timidity which may be natural in view of their ecclesiastical relations, for it takes away the reason for their existence, but they cannot escape from it without intellectual stultification. They know that they have given up the whole authority of their theological system by making it a fabric of human speculation purely; but they dare not take the laity into their full confidence. Infidels though they be themselves, they tremble, and not unreasonably, at the consequences which would be involved in the destruction of the popular belief in the supernaturalism of the Bible.

Meantime, archeology is joining with philosophy in subjecting the scriptures to scientific criticism, and the results of the investigations and examinations are accepted as indisputable even in theological seminaries of orthodoxy, not merely by such men as Dr. Briggs, but also by professors whose heresy has not been brought under ecclesiastical condemnation.

Our correspondents who discuss the case of Dr. Abbott have no conception of the tremendous revolution in sentiment of which it is a symptom. All the Infidelity of past periods has been of no consequence as compared with the present Infidelity, of which, for the moment, he has made himself an example. It is an Infidelity which strickes at the supernatural basis upon which Christianity rests, and therefore relegates the religion of Christendom to the position of mere mythology and infallible human philosophy.

A HARD PROBLEM.

All authorities agree that Peru, South America, at the time of the Spanish conquest, had a population of thirty millions. With its immense territory, genial climate, and varied productions, it ought to have a population at this time, some 400 years after the Spanish invasion, of more than 150,000,000; instead it has only about 5,000,000.

That government and that system of religion which best protects the people in the enjoyment of their natural rights, advances their happiness and makes them prosperous, must be for them the best government and the best religion. Under the Incas they were worshipers of the sun. The empire was divided into four provinces, with a viceroy in each. Those provinces were subdivided into departments of 10,000, each with a governor. And these divisions went on until the smallest embraced but ten persons, ruled by a head man who was responsible for the conduct of his subordinates, and was required to see that each enjoyed his fullest rights without molestation.

How much were these people the gainers by the introduction of what is labeled "Christian civilization" among them?

WHAT WILL BE LEFT?

Now comes the painful intelligence that Rev. Wm. Lloyd, pastor of the Central Congregational church, New York, in a discourse on the evening of the 21st ult., compared the story of Baalam and his ass, which spoke with the voice of man, to the vision of the dagger which warned Macbeth against the crime he contemplated. He claimed the whole affair was an allegory and said: "It is incredible only when the demand is made that the whole story be accepted as literally true."

Thus good orthodox preachers are demolishing one by one the sacred stories of the holy Scriptures. How long, Great God, how long is thy inspired record to be trifled with by puny man, in his feeble attempts to render untrustworthy thy infallible word? What will be left when they close their criticisms?

Whatsoever situation in life you ever wish or propose for yourself, acquire a clear and lucid idea of the inconveniences attending it.—Shenstone.

IMPORTANT LETTER.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE HONORABLE G. B. SWIFT, MAYOR OF CHICAGO, AND THE CITY ALDERMEN.

Dear Sirs:—The Chicago Record of March 2nd contains the following:

"Alderman Gazzolo believes that persons who gain a livelihood by dealing in things mysterious should divide their professional fees with the city. In accordance with this belief he introduced an ordinance obliging any person engaged in the business of fortune-teller by cards or otherwise, clairvoyant, astrologer, palmist, spiritualistic mediums, trance mediums, occultists, phrenologist or hypnotist, shall pay a quarterly license of $50 or an annual license of $200."

Now, then, Mr. Mayor, and Aldermen of Chicago, Spiritualists are, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, law-abiding citizens; this fact can be ascertained by investigating the criminal records in every State in the Union. They like to be well governed, but not too much. They are an investigating and inquisitive class of people; from such people springs the inventor and reformer.

Naturally they have a desire to inquire into the object of any proposed law and to ascertain the motives of the man who introduces any new ordinance.

Laws are enacted, we suppose, to protect the general public from imposition, persecution and danger to life and property.

The public would be pleased to know whether it desires to be protected from the class of people mentioned in the proposed bill.

The Spiritualists and attendants of spiritual meetings probably would foot up to nearly 40,000 people in this city. These people would object to having these places of interest and worship closed as the bill suggests.

Allow us to ask, what is the grievance? Has the honorable gentleman got into any embarrasing conditions, such as purchasing love-powders that did not work?

Is the offense that needs to be lawed out of existence, that of "gaining a livelihood"?

Had we better go into the more lucrative business of holding up cashiers and be respectable?

Is it for "dealing with things mysterious?" Then let the bill include all chemists, physicians, anatomists, physiologists, electricians and college professors; they should be taxed also.

Is it for "forecasting the future"? Then let every Protestant clergyman in the pulpit who receives more money in a month than most mediums do in a year, be fined also.

The minister attempts to tell about, locate and describe Heaven and Hell, and makes a ridiculous farce of it, too, as you well know.

Better include every newspaper editor who forecast the election of each favorite candidate for public office, and also get after the man in the Auditorium tower who has been furnishing us with such abominable weather lately; he gets salary enough; he can afford it.

Better visit each Catholic priest who, besides his enormous salary, accepts money for absolutions, confessions and masses, all of which he knows to be a humbug.

Why should we, who are fulfilling the prophecies of the Bible and following the advice of the Nazarene and all the Apostles to cultivate our spiritual gifts, be taxed for obeying that which the Christian does not, though he pretends to be a follower of Christ?

Phrenology, astrology and psychometry have been proven to be sciences and arts necessary to the development of the mentality in man.

Let the gentleman read the scientific literature upon these points and his narrow prejudiced mind will expand sufficiently to think on these things.

Every preacher, lawyer, orator, editor, musician, poet and inventor receives from this same invisible spiritual reservoir his thoughts, plans and new ideas.

Who shall define the limits of the mind of man?

Who shall say in this enlightened age that death ends all?

Who can deny that all these gifts and arts mentioned are God-given for our benefit?

Are not the "gifts of the spirit" to be respected and applied to our everyday life?

Should the inspirational musician and poet be curtailed in his aspirations?

Have we been suddenly jerked back to the days of religious persecution and inquisition, a time when man seemed to forget the difference between himself and the lion and hyena?

Who is the gentleman that in this day of intellectual liberty, undertakes to lay down "You shall and you sha'n't" to more than ten million of sympathizers with mediumship in this glorious free America?

There are more than 160 Spiritualist societies under the jurisdiction of the National Spiritualists' Association, and as many more not yet in line but are "falling in" fast.

Think you or any other fair-minded man that such attempts to encroach upon the religious liberties of this mass of people will not react upon the man who seeks their votes?

There are fakirs, we are sorry to know, but would it not be well to attack them individually instead of such a sweeping strike as is proposed?

Curtail the abominable methods employed by those "Seventh sons of the seventh son;" and born with a veil, etc., all of which has humbug on its face, and which thousands of respectable Spiritualists do not endorse.

We have no sympathy for these jewel-bedecked and painted charlatans; but to give them their due we have yet to know of any of them using undue influence to entice people to call upon them.

If some people get fooled by a fraud, shall all be responsible? What a lively time would there be if this principle was carried out in politics, banking and all kinds of business?

The newspapers record nearly every day scandals and crimes committed by clergymen of the Christian churches, thus forcing thousands of sensible people into skepticism.

Where there is a demand, there is a supply.

If there were no fraudulent and deceptive people, there would be no fakirs or criminals or immoral preachers.

If the public did not receive something that was interesting at the twenty or more spiritual meetings every Sunday, in this city, the halls would not be so crowded.

If mediumship under the different heads mentioned was all fraudulent there would not be so many millions of brainy men and women who believe in it.

We know of but very few among the many mediums that could possibly pay such a tax even if it was collectable. It surely is not in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

We that have worked for many years as conscientiously as any preacher could to better the community with our gifts, respectfully ask you to consider this question well before allowing it to pass.

There are many of us who hold ordination papers from Illinois and other States that allow us all the privileges accorded to all other ministers that try to teach immortality.

The courts will protect the possessors of these credentials, and no doubt should this ordinance pass your Honorable Council, there will be some lively tilts between the representatives of both sides.

We have faith, that the good sense of our Mayor and Aldermen will prevail against this unjust bill. Respectfully yours, G. F. PERKINS, President, Beacon Light Spiritual Church.

SPIRIT PORTRAITS.

THE BANGS SISTERS ARE THE MEDIUMS.

Among the many phases of genuine phenomena presented through the agency of psychics, there is nothing more beautiful and convincing than the portraits produced through the mediumship of May and Lizzie Bangs, at No. 3 Elizabeth street, Chicago.

Life-sized portraits are produced without touch by human hands—no brushes, paints or coloring matter of any kind being furnished, the only preparation being the mounted canvas on which the portraits appear with every tint of life-like expression and bearing the mark of an artist's hand.

Many portraits of the kind were produced at Clinton Camp during the season of 1896, and under such conditions as to preclude all idea of fraud or collusion in any manner whatever.

It has been my good fortune to receive a group of three faces on a canvas 25x30 inches, including a portrait of my wife who passed to spirit-life eight years ago last December, and of whom I had no likeness whatever.

Scores of people who knew her, readily recognized the face as hers, and all concur in the opinion that viewed simply as a work of art it is a beautiful and wonderful expression of the power of the invisibles to portray the faces of our so-called dead upon canvas.

Among others who have received portraits of their loved ones, is W. S. Sharpneck, an inventor residing at No. 4 Elizabeth street, who received a portrait of his daughter Blanche, who passed away three years ago at the age of twelve years. So delighted was he with this beautiful token of the continued life and affection of his daughter that he conceived the idea of having the second portrait painted, full length, and under the most absolute test conditions.

He procured a canvas six by four feet, which was enclosed in a wooden box made for the purpose, having iron hinges and secured by four padlocks purchased and applied by himself, he retaining the keys until the portrait was completed.

The work was executed in his own room and at no time was the canvas in the hands of the mediums, nor did they have anything whatever to do with the details of the work in hand, not even offering a suggestion, but simply sat quietly in the room during the progress of the work.

Six separate sittings were given to the production, the whole time occupying less than five hours.

Through the courtesy of Mr. and Mrs. Sharpneck, I was invited to be present at the last sitting, Monday evening, March 1st, and which occupied thirty minutes. At the expiration of that time we were informed by the guides that the work was completed and the box might be opened. This was done, and a most beautiful picture greeted our astonished vision.

In the foreground was the full length portrait of Blanche, four feet, ten inches in height, the figure draped in white with a delicate tinge of blue.

Her left hand, dropped at her side, holds one end of a chain of roses, with the right hand in the attitude of placing the other end over her right shoulder, while a number of the roses are detached and have fallen at her feet. On her neck is a reproduction of a chain and locket, and on the little finger of the left hand a ring with red settings, both of which she was accustomed to wear.

The portrait appears to be that of a beautiful girl of fifteen, and this would be her age at the present time.

On her right is a flower-stand with a vase or bowl containing roses, while around the base of the stand are tulips, growing and in blossom. On the left are palms and ferns, and in the background trees, and the dim outlines of buildings showing through the foliage, and a shaft or column running the entire length of the picture.

There are delicate tracings of blue throughout the whole work, giving it a soft and pleasing finish, while the portrait unmistakably resembles a photo of Blanche in her earthly life.

In accordance with the wishes of the guides, flowers, consisting of roses, tulips, carnations and forgetmenots were placed in the box with the canvas, every vestige of which had disappeared on the opening of the box.

With limited powers of description it is not possible to convey an adequate conception of the beauty of the work, and it must be seen to be appreciated.

In these times when so much is doubtful in the presentation of phenomena, it is cheering to know that there are instruments of the higher powers, through whose agency such beautiful expressions can be given to mortals.

Long may they live to give to a skeptical and creed-bound humanity these glorious demonstrations of the power of the spirits and the continuity of life.

The picture is on exhibition at the rooms of Mr. and Mrs. Sharpneck, who will take pleasure in showing it to all parties who may be interested.

WILL C. HODGE.

We hereby certify that the above description of the portrait of Blanche Sharpneck, and the manner of its production is absolutely true. Signed

CHAPTER IX.

THE SPIRITUAL ISLE OF PATMOS.

SOLON AND MARY VISIT A SPIRITUAL ISLE OF PATMOS WITHIN THE HEAVENLY SPHERES.

"This Isle," said Paul, when we had become seated, "corresponds to the Isle of Patmos; an intermediate state between two distinct conditions; and all who dwell on such isles are mediators between heaven and hell. Hell, meaning a darker, more ignorant and unhappy condition; heaven, a wiser, happier state. A mediator simply means, what at the present day on earth among men is called a medium; and John, the revelator, was simply an excellent medium or seer; and he remains such unto the present time, except that he is farther along the chain of being, higher up the scale."

"Jesus was a mediator or medium. John was the same. As for me I cannot claim such a distinction, although I realized when on earth, that man had an immortal soul, and that there was a natural body and a spiritual body, which now has been demonstrated to all who are on this side of life. I also realized that I then could but see through a glass darkly, whereas now we all see each other as we are; yet, as you are well aware, many, very many spirits and even angels, still are looking through glasses darkly."

"You say," I observed, "that John still continues to be a seer or medium. I would that he might give to us now, a manifestation of his power."

Whereupon John bowed and spread forth his hands, when, shortly, there appeared before us a large and powerful horse, together with his rider, and soon we were in the midst of a vision, and this is what we saw: A thousand horsemen or couriers drawn up before us, and each carried in his right hand a flaming torch, and we heard a trumpeter's call, and the horses all reared high in the air, and at the word of command each started at full speed until they seemed to fly into every land on the earthly globe; and each horseman waved his torch high above his head, as he cried:

"Behold! The fire from heaven! Come forth all who are hidden in darkness, whose torches have long been extinguished. Come forth, and relight your fires!"

Whereupon many came forth bearing extinguished torches in their hands. Then each heavenly horseman bent down with his flaming torch, and relighted thousands of souls whose heavenly torches had long been extinguished, and still the cry resounded:

"Come forth, all who are in darkness, and relight your torches!" And still they filed past, the heavenly horsemen, and so many torches were at length relighted that no more darkness remained on earth. Then we saw the heavenly horsemen returning, and as they rode one by one past John and Paul, a new commandment was given them. Their torches became large vials; not filled with wrath, but oil; and the trumpet sounded, and again they sped forth to all the lands of the earth, and they shouted:

"Come forth, all who desire of us oil from heaven wherewith to replenish the land!"

And many came forth, and received oil into their bottles; and when they had received it, each as much as was needed, behold peace and plenty reigned throughout all the earth, and there were no more wars, nor famine, nor pestilence, and all men became brothers of one accord; and again the horsemen returned, and presently vanished from our sight.

"Wouldst thou behold more?" asked Paul.

We assented. Again John stretched forth his hands, and, lo! a beautiful white horse stood before us, and seated upon it a woman of exceeding beauty. A loud voice said: "Behold the Princess of the world! The Lamb's wife!"

And I, Solon, marveled much at this, and I said to Paul: "I do not understand the meaning of this. What is meant by the Lamb?"

Whereupon there appeared before us a flock of white sheep, and the beautiful woman held within her hand a wand, and she stretched it forth over the sheep, and immediately they were changed, and each appeared as a beautiful white palfrey, and on each was seated a lovely virgin, all holding wands in their right hands, and above each forehead shone a star of exceeding brightness. A star also blazed forth above the head of the Lamb's wife. And we heard the sound of a bugle, and the Lamb's wife rode forth, with her maids, to the four quarters of the earth, and they stretched forth their wands, crying: "Come forth, all ye who are weary and heavy laden!"

And, behold, a great multitude came forth to meet them, but these were all women, and those upon the horses stretched forth their wands and touched the foreheads of these sorrowful ones, and forthwith a blazing star appeared on each, and all who were thus touched were sealed to the Lamb's wife, and each received a wand, and whosoever they touched were also sealed; and the Lamb's wife, with her maids, returned, and the picture vanished from our sight, and I said:

"Tell me the meaning of all this?"

And I heard a voice, saying:

"When all men shall bear the torch of heavenly truth within their hands, relighted by heaven's messengers, the angels, and the oil of peace and love to his brother man, when every woman shall be sealed to the Lamb's wife, which meaneth, when her mind shall comprehend the meaning of true marriage in all its holiness, when her soul shall be so white and clean that nothing can tempt her feet to stray, and no man can call her wife until he is as pure and peaceful as a lamb, not even until she fully understands the true meaning of the star in her forehead, for by the light of that star she shall know to whom she belongs by natural rights. And the star meaneth heavenly intuitive knowledge."

"Now, my dear Solon," said Paul, "I will give you a few maxims—maxims that are as old as the universe itself, and then we will go our way and leave you to your work."

"'Except ye become as little children ye can in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven;' in other words, the kindom of happiness.'

"A little child is naturally simple, innocent, free from error and guile; its sould ready and eager to receive knowledge; and when the spirits of men and women become thus, and are willing to receive truths from the higher angels or messengers, then will heaven or happiness be theirs."

"'Except ye be born again, ye can in nowise inherit the kingdom of God.'"

"To many this is a dark saying, but I shall ask you, my dear Solon and Mary, to tell me, what it is to be born again? As you have already passed through three births, you are certainly able to tell mankind something about it."

And I made answer, thus: "First, I was born from the darkness of my mother's womb, into a world of light, or rather, it appeared as a world of light to my former dark state. Secondly, I was born from the dark womb of my material body into a world of light, or at least it appeared as a world of light to my former imprisoned condition. Thirdly, I was born from my spiritual state, into a brighter and happier condition, the angel state; and now, I very well know that I shall be born again into the brighter, more beautiful state still, that of the archangel; and from thence to that of the God-angel; and so on, and at each new birth greater heights of happiness or heaven are attained."

"It is easier for a camel to go through the needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter heaven, in other words, be happy."

"To be extremely rich, is to be accursed or unhappy; for he who has much wealth is like one buried alive. His soul is weighted down or imprisoned beneath a great load of care from which it is impossible to escape, and so he is bound and pinioned beneath His riches, and consequently cannot rise into heaven or happiness."

Thereupon, Paul rose up, and taking a large and wide mantle from his shoulders, he cast it about our two forms, and immediately disappeared from our view. Thereupon John also rose up and placed upon our heads crowns of gold, and vanished from our sight; and Mary and I were left alone, in our new abode, well knowing the signification of the mantle, and the shining golden crown. The mantle signified love, the crown wisdom; and now we actually appeared somewhat as the angels of heaven are described within the Christians' Bible.

The mantle parted and became two long and shining robes of light, which surrounded us; each crown appeared like the shining golden sun, and we were within the Temple of the Most High, our souls singing praises to God forevermore.

But, oh! how such words as these are misunderstood. The Temple was simply the surroundings of our own souls. The Most High, the highest that our souls were at this time capable of and our souls were singing with joy and gladness, and heaven or happiness was within us, and we were angels of God, for we were messengers sent by the Most High, or the highest within us, forth on missions of love to mankind, and those who were yet in darkness or unhappiness and error, to give to them, as many as would, receive, light, wisdom, truth, love, and tell them of our high and happy condition; to open the eyes of the blind—the eyes of their understanding—that they might see the light and beauty of holiness, and old error of darkness drop away from them; and this was to be our home for a time, until we should attain to a still higher and better one, which would be that of the archangel, over in yonder glorious city of the New Jerusalem.

But to gain that city, and condition, we must work long and faithfully, and our work must be that of saving others from hell, which simply means error, ignorance, unhappiness, intemperance, and evil doing of all kinds.

And now methinks I hear you ask:

"How are Angels, or God's Messengers, to accomplish this?"

I will tell you, my friends. There is but one way of doing this. One, and one only; and that way is—whosoever has ears to hear let him hear—to enter the earthly, or the spiritual spheres, influence or control the brain of a medium or sensitive, and work with and through such an one; and as many as will hear, and follow the truth, let them hear.

All men desire that the spirit of the Most High shall rest upon them, and I have already explained the meaning of the Most High, which is the highest within our own souls to which we can possibly attain, and then we return and shed this love, wisdom, and truth, upon mankind through their babes, sucklings, and innocent ones; very seldom through the rich, those high in authority, and grossly opinionated; for it would be harder for us to reach such than for a camel to go through the needle's eye.

And thus ends the first book of Solon and Mary. When on earth I was a medium between the spirits and man. After becoming a spirit I was still a medium between the angelic and spiritual and man. I am at the time of this writing, a medium between the archangel, the angel, the spirit and man.

Receive our teachings, we beseech you, for they are true. We will write again as soon as we become an Archangel!

SOLON, MARY.

SPIRITUALISM SCIENTIFICALLY DEMONSTRATED.

BY PROF. ROBERT HARE.

His Remarkable Researches Made in the Early Years of Spiritualism.

Directly Edited and Revised by Him, Now in Spirit-Life.

THE MANIFESTATIONS AT STRATFORD, CONN.

The manifestations at Stratford in the house of Rev. Eliakim Phelps, as reported by Capon were every way more astounding than those beginning two years previously at Hydesville, N. Y. The character of the Phelps family, belonging as it did to the most intellectual and religious in New England, and the carefulness with which the phenomena were observed for more than a year, places them beyond the pale of trickery. The house was a fine country mansion and Dr. Phelps had resided in it for nearly two years before anything unusual took place. On the tenth of March, 1850, it being the Sabbath, Dr. Phelps and family, consisting of Mrs. Phelps, two daughters, and two sons, the eldest a daughter aged sixteen, a son of twelve years, and a second daughter of six years, children of Mrs. Phelps by a former marriage, and another son of Dr. Phelps by the present marriage, not then three years old, all attended church, and an Irish servant girl, who had been employed in the family some six months, and had shown herself to be honest and trustworthy, had gone on that day to Bridgeport, to attend the Catholic church. On leaving the house in the morning, it appears that the doctor had secured the chamber doors, and put the keys in his pocket; those which could be were locked inside and the keys left in them. The only door by which the chambers could be entered was locked, and the key taken by Dr. Phelps. He also locked the front door inside, left the key in the lock, and, passing out at the back door, locked that, and placed the key in his pocket. On returning from church at noon, the front door was found standing open; the chamber doors, which were left fastened, were now open; and in the nursery the furniture was thrown about in disorder; chairs on the bed, and thrown down upon the floor; the shovel, tongs, and poker, with other things, were in unusual positions and places, every thing showing unmistakable signs of the work of some rude hand making mischief in their absence. Upon their discovering the disorder here, Dr. Phelps passed into other rooms on the same floor, but could see no further evidence of intrusion. The first supposition was, very naturally, that some person or persons had entered and robbed the house. Search was immediately made in the closets where silver plate, spoons, forks, etc., were kept. All were found safe and undisturbed. A gold watch, left in an exposed place, remained there as left. The impression still remained that burglars had been in; and, on examination of the windows, one was found that could be raised from the outside, and though there was no evidence of entrance having been made there, no doubt existed that this was the place of access. Thinking they might return during the afternoon, Dr. Phelps remained at home, the other members of the family going again to church. Being left alone, the doctor armed himself, and, selecting a secluded position, awaited the return of the burglars. There was no disturbance during the afternoon; no sound of footfall; all remained quiet. On the return of the family, after the service, usually closing at three o'clock, several other articles were found out of place, but not in a way to make it certain that they were not moved in the morning. Articles of kitchen furniture were changed about. A teakettle, which had been used at dinner-time, was found hidden behind some boxes in the cellar. The bread, sugar-bowl, eggs, and numerous other things kept in the kitchen, were found where they did not belong, and where they had evidently been placed in some way which the family could not account for. Upon entering the middle chamber, occupied as a sleeping-room, a sheet was found spread over the bed outside the counterpane, and beneath which was a nightgown and chemise laid out with the arms folded across the breast, with stockings placed in a position to represent, as it seemed, a corpse disposed as is usual before placing it in the coffin. On the wall were written characters resembling those said by certain clairvoyants to belong to a spiritual language, but which none of the family were able to decipher. Whether they had any significance, or how they came there was alike an unanswerable question by the family; they had not observed them before. Occurrences ceased for that day and night, yet, no one thinking of any mystery in the matter, they imputed it to roguish boys, or others, who had effected entrance with false keys, for mischief rather than for robbery, and that the culprits would soon be detected. The next morning, March 11th, when the family went up stairs, after breakfast, the middle chamber had again been visited, exhibiting much the same scene of disorder presented the previous day. A sheet was spread out upon the floor, the washstand laid upon its back upon the sheet, a candlestick set upon the stand, the washbowl placed upon one side, and the pitcher on the other. The nightgown and chemise, used on the previous occasion to represent a dead body, were found one in the bowl, the other in the pitcher. It appears that these articles of clothing were not then in use; they had been placed in a trunk which stood in a closet adjoining that room. They were replaced in the trunk when removed from the bed the day before. As they were conversing in relation to the disposition of the things as above stated, Mrs. Phelps looked under the bed, and discovered articles there, partially concealed by the bed, resembling those in question. They were taken out and pronounced to be the same. Dr. Phelps had not before examined them, but then took them, noted the name and number on each, as they were marked, folded and placed them again in the trunk, remarking that he would put them where they would stay; did not lock the trunk, not having a key, but locked the closet and placed the key about his own person; then requesting the family to all leave the room first, which they did, the doctor, following, locked the door of the room, and kept the key. Having observed that Mrs. Phelps seemed a little troubled as to the mystery, he thought to convince her that there was no mystery in the matter, and, having secured the closet and room, he descended to the rooms below, following them all. After the lapse of some fifteen minutes, some person spoke to the doctor, upon which he went up to the chambers. At the head of the stairs, out in the hall, he found the same articles which he had left as before stated. He examined them, and was positive they were the same. He went to the door, found it locked, entered by applying the key from his pocket, went to the closet, found it locked, took the key from his pocket, opened the door, looked in the trunk, and the articles were gone! Dr. Phelps states that he was confident there was no deception in the case, and that he then, for the first, felt that there was a mystery about the affair. He had never believed in the appearing of ghosts or departed spirits, warnings, or anything of that nature, and, at the age of three-score, had never seen or heard any thing connected with that class of phenomena. The evidence upon which such superstitions, as he termed them, rest, he had never examined, and, while he had no proof positive that they were impossible, and never did occur, he had no evidence to found a belief upon that they ever had. His idea of spiritual manifestations seems to have been that most, if not all, followed by a strict scrutiny, might be accounted for on natural or known principles, or some physical means, which would disrobe them of the mysterious altogether. But it was not to rest here. On the same day (March 11th) the moving and throwing of furniture commenced. An umbrella, standing at the end of the hall, leaped, without visible assistance, a distance of at least twenty-five feet. Dr. Phelps saw the movement, and knows there was no perceptible agency by which the motion was produced. A bucket standing at the head of the stairs, was thrown into the entry below. Smaller articles, such as nails, forks, knives, spoons, bits of tin, iron, and keys, were thrown from different directions about the house. He says, "There were times when they came from such directions that they might have been thrown by some person in the house"—at least, that may be admitted, but in very many cases the motion and point of starting were such as to preclude all possibility of deception on the part of persons in the rooms. During the afternoon, Dr. and Mrs. Phelps had occasion to go to Bridgeport, a distance of some three miles. During their absence the shovel and tongs, standing in the dining-room, were thrown violently down the basement stairs; a piece of mourning-crape fastened to the knocker of the back door, and the mirrors in the front chambers covered with sheets and tablecloths, as is the custom in some parts of the country while a person lies dead in the house. The crape on the door Dr. Phelps did not see, but the covering on the mirrors he removed with his own hands. The position of the mirrors in one room was such that the coverings could not, without great difficulty have been placed there by any person about the house. Various articles were said to have been thrown about the room—the phenomena continuing in his absence about the same as when he was present in the fore part of the day. Soon after sundown all was again quiet, and so continued through the night.

"The next morning, (March 12th,) soon after the family were up, the same phenomena began; knives, forks, spoons, blocks of wood, nails, etc., etc. were thrown from different directions, and with increased frequency, attended by still stranger circumstances, and those of a still more mysterious character. Mrs. Phelps expressed some alarm, and a wish that some of the neighbors might be called in. Dr. Phelps called on a retired clergyman of Stratford, a man of extensive information, much experience, and sound judgment, who was universily admitted to be capable of rendering correct judgment and good advice in such a case. He requested him to call and spend an hour at the house, to which he cheerfully consented. Dr. P. told him that his family had been a little excited by some occurrences in the house, but did not state any of the details of the matter, but desired that he would sit with them for a short time and witness for himself. He remained all day, but was at first, firmly of the opinion that the occurrences were produced, in some way, through the agency of the girl, or some other person about the house, and his main attention was directed to the girl in the kitchen, or the children, in the expectation that he should detect them in doing it.

"The door leading from the parlors to the kitchen was, by his request, locked, and all communication between it and the other parts of the house cut off; still, the throwing of articles went on as before. The children were sent out of the room, and the doors locked; but this made no difference. He stayed through most of the day on Thursday, and returned soon after breakfast next morning, and remained most of the time for nearly three weeks. He became satisfied, before the close of the second day, that neither the girl in the kitchen nor the children had any agency in producing the strange movements. During the day (March 12th) some of the neighbors were in the house, and small blocks of wood were seen to fall in different places in their presence; but only one person noticed them in a way to excite inquiry, and that person was requested not to mention what she had seen.

"On Wednesday, March 13th, the manifestations commenced early in the morning, in the middle chamber, the room in which two children slept, and began while they were both asleep.

"Rev. Mr.—— came in soon after breakfast, and remained during the day. Several Bibles were opened at different passages, which seemed to be selected with a great deal of care, and indicated either by placing small pieces of paper on them or turning down a leaf. These things first occurred in the middle chamber, where the library stood. While the family were at dinner similar things were done in the parlor adjoining the dining-room. Two Bibles and an Episcopal prayer-book were opened at different passages, chairs turned forward on the floor, two solar lamps placed on the floor, a hat and man's cap put one on each; nearly every thing in the room had been moved, and in so short a time, that it seems wholly inadmissible that any person about the house could have done it; beside, the whole household were in the dining-room, all seated at the table, except the servant, and she was employed waiting on the table.

"In the afternoon the demonstrations were confined to the middle parlor; Dr. and Mrs. Phelps, and Mr.——, and, a part of the time, the eldest daughter, being present; in the absence of the daughter the doors were locked, and the three first named only were present.

"The throwing of various things occupied the afternoon. The articles thrown were picked up and placed upon the mantel, and between the hours of one and four o'clock, the number amounted to forty-six; among which were nails, bits of tin, iron keys and small blocks, all of which were gathered from different parts of the house; most of them from closets on the second floor and the chambers. At one time, while Mr.—— was standing near the center of the room, a padlock, which was known to have been in the closet of the middle chamber, fell at his feet. He took it in his hand, letting it fall from different heights, to discover the probable distance it must have fallen to produce the concussion. After various trials it was judged to have fallen not more than two or two and a half feet. As Dr. P. was sitting, perhaps ten feet from the piano-forte, he saw a small toy-mouse, which was on the piano, arise as if tossed, and, describing a parabola as it came, fall at his side, so near that he took it from the floor without leaving his chair. This he speaks of seeing as distinctly as he ever saw anything, the whole being perfectly in his view. He also saw, in the same way, among other things, a nail, cotton-spool, and key, arise from behind the sofa, which stood diagonally across the corner of the room. He arose, went to the sofa, looking behind and under it, but could discover nothing which might give impulse to the articles. While examining the carpet about the sofa to find if any other things were there, without success, as his eyes were directed to one spot, there arose from that very point a piece of cheese-rind, perhaps eight inches from the floor; when he saw it first it arose four or five feet, passed over the sofa, and fell on the floor. He is positive it was not there when he was looking at the carpet, and knows there was no visible means of its moving.

"Mr. M—— suggested, as he was about to leave on Wednesday night, that if the strange phenomena should return, he would like to have some other persons called in. Early the next morning, Thursday, the 14th, the manifestations commenced about as they had on the previous day. Soon after breakfast a sheet was found spread upon the floor, several Bibles were opened at different places, the candlesticks, in a row, the highest in the middle, and covered with a sheet; other articles changed about the room, without any seeming design, more than to attract attention. Mr. M—— proposed that notes be despatched to Rev. Mr. W——, Congregational minister, and Mr. Plant, a lawyer of high standing and respectability, which was accordingly done. It was at this time that they first began to hear rappings and heavy poundings. A loud sound, like some person striking the floor with some heavy substance, was heard, generally in the middle chamber. This was usually done when no one was in the chamber, and on any one entering all was still. In one instance a chair was seen to rise from the floor and beat down again, five or six times, with a violence which caused the house to tremble so as to be felt in all the adjoining apartments. A large plated candlestick, standing on the mantel, was moved by some unseen power to the floor, and then rose up and down, beating the floor, until the candlestick was broken. This was the first article that was damaged about the house. Several times during the day loud noises, like some one pounding with an axe or some heavy substance on the floor, were heard in different parts of the house, and several times the loud poundings terminated with a frightful scream; it was not a cry of distress, or anything that could be easily imitated, seeming like something between the cry of a cat and the bleating of a calf, but louder than either. These sounds occurred in all probably twenty times while the manifestations were going on. Sometimes the screams seemed to be in the third story, sometimes in the front-hall chamber, several times out in the yard, and occasionally in other places. There was at no time any audible expression of words. The sounds consisted of poundings, knockings, and screamings. On this day the first images were found which will be spoken of more fully hereafter.

"In the evening of this day, just after some young ladies had called, Dr. P.'s daughter returned to the parlor, it being between nine and ten o'clock. After seeing the young ladies to the door, an iron stand, in which stood the fire-shovel, tongs, and poker, leaped from the hearth, where it stood, into the middle of the floor, and arose up and beat the floor with a force that made a jar that could be felt, and the sound heard, in any part of the house. This was seen only by the daughter, but Dr. P. and wife heard the noise. The daughter ran through the dining-room to get up stairs, and, as she passed, a large table was standing, with other furniture, arranged for breakfast the next morning. The table was three feet nine inches wide, and five feet three inches long, made of solid mahogany; and when she entered the room it rose up and beat five or six times against the floor with a force which made the house jar. The noise was heard by many persons in the house. Mrs. P. was alarmed, and screamed out, 'Oh, take me from this place!' This happened between nine and ten o'clock, p. m. Previous to this time all manifestations had ceased by sundown, or a little after.

"An umbrella which he was carrying was in a mysterious manner, torn in several pieces. His pantaloons were torn from the bottom upward, as high as the knee, and sometimes higher, and were literally torn to ribbons, an inch or more wide. This occurred several times under the immediate inspection of Rev. Mr. M., which seems to fix the fact that, in those instances at least, no power visible did it. Thus it continued for several weeks, clothing to the amount of twenty dollars being destroyed. At one time, while he was riding in a carriage with Dr. P., his cap on his head was torn in a mysterious manner, and his pants torn from the waistband to the bottom, in a way that no human power could have done. Dr. P. heard them torn, but could see nothing doing it, and knows the boy could not have done it himself. It was on this day, March 15th, that images, dressed in articles of clothing, were again seen; only two or three appeared on that day. The most extraordinary occurrences of this kind took place on Saturday, the 16th. Soon after breakfast two or three images appeared in the middle chamber; soon again another, followed by others still numbering in all eleven or twelve. They were formed of articles of clothing, found about the house, stuffed to resemble the human figure. A lady's dress would be stuffed in some cases with a muff; again with a pillow, and sometimes with other dresses; a bonnet and shoes were aptly placed to complete the figure. These, on this occasion, all but one, represented females in the attitude of devotion, some having Bibles or prayer-books placed before them. One formed of Mrs. P.'s dress, so much resembled the real, that the little boy, scarce three years old, coming into the room with his sister, older, whispered, 'Be still, ma is saying prayers.'

A STARTLING FACT.

The Progressive Thinker was the only Spiritualist paper that had the enterprise to publish Prof. Barrett's address before the National Association Convention of Spiritualists We have his address, covering three pages, and five other fine addresses and articles, one by Col, Ingersoll, grouped in one paper, and we want to send out 1,000,000 of them. It is worth ten times its weight in gold.

UNDER THE FLASHLIGHT.

AN IMPOSTOR EXPOSED—HOW TO DEVELOP AS AN ARTIST—HOW THE TRICK WAS PERFORMED—WHAT FOOLS THESE MORTALS BE!

To the Editor:—Evansville is in a state of excitement over a recent visit of one of the greatest impostors, we feel, we have in our spiritual ranks today. Some four weeks ago there arrived in our midst, Mr. Frank Donovan, the supposed medium, who claims mediumship is no gift, but obtainable, providing your purse is of sufficient length to receive his instructions—Capital I. Right he is, this development needs no assistance from the spirit world—as has been proven. All the requirements necessary are a gullible public—his own testimony being that Spiritualists are the most easily deceived. Yes, he found a hungry lot of us, for we were seeking a prophet from another clime—old and young, great and small, intelligent and weak-minded ones, the latter predominating—I being one of the number.

That we were unbalanced is proven by the fact that we entertained said Donovan for a month, with his coarse illiterate manifestations. Imagine individuals, many of us claiming, we have outgrown faith and have ripened into knowledge—yet sitting for three hours singing "Nearer, my God to Thee," then to give the Devil his dues—singing "Hella Hel-le Hel lo," a song sung at all German festivities, especially towards the wee small hours when drink is supposed to make one happy, forgetting the cares of life. But we endured all this, for we were waiting for pictures on wet handkerchiefs—supposed to be the work of the spirit world!

Yet he, Donovan, had spent all day outlining the cuts from newspapers and almanacs, with an indelible pencil—as is vouched for by the lady with whom he boarded, as her son was kept busy collecting old papers from hotels, and cigar stores. These papers he would take in the back yard and burn—though asked for them. Enclosed, Brother Francis, I send you a sample of my recent development—which came to me through impression, after I heard the above testimony from the lady. This is a fac simile of what Donovan gave us; the imagination of each sitter was stretched with that earnestness only known to those who open their mouths and accept all that comes under the name of Spiritualism. Many of us felt there was the resemblance of father, brother, mother or sister, and preserved these treasures with the utmost care and tenderness! Verily what fools we mortals be.

Let all try this experiment of transferring pictures, which will awaken us to the fact that two-thirds of what is given us to-day that causes such wonderment is produced by the spirit yet in the body. Outline your picture carefully with an ordinary indelible pencil, wet your cloth, or handerchief, place face downward, then with a little pressure of the hand; then raise the picture, when lo! you will find yourself a full-fledged medium, with an artist control! Then, if you can bury conscience (or have none), as seems to be the case with these charlatans, you are ready for work, and a green field awaits you—with an emphasis on the green.

Now, wherever this said Donovan may pitch his tent, we Spiritualists of Evansville will give the readers this bit of advice: Assist him in making the pictures, if you must have them, for you will find it a tedious undertaking for one to perform alone.

Then, his test producer—his telegraphy—just you place yourself where you get a full view of his hands as they drop on his knees, while you are asked to write the message—which are of such depth as "I am glad you are here—will do what I can for you, Bro. W."

Follow these directions, and conditions are no-good—won't-work—something's the matter.

Then, in the dark seance, the first and most important step: See that he has no confederate, and hold on, not only to the left hand (for all hands are joined) but with a death grip to his right—when it will be proven that he possesses no gift, according to his own testimony.

The last seance given in our house brought this latter fact to the surface. An elderly lady—a good honest Spiritualist—testified, as she would under oath, that under a pretense of scratching or rubbing his face, another hand, supposed to be that of the lady to his left, was placed in hers. She felt his every movement, as the supposed manifestations were going on. Which, of course, when accused, he denied, promising us a test circle, which he took the pains to put off for nearly two weeks, when, if honest, it should have been done immediately. Yes, he gave two tests seances before he left, making his own conditions! the manifestations being carried out through the confederate. This can be proven.

In behalf of truth, I send this statement on its mission, with a hope that Spiritualists at large may profit by our experience. How will we ever get rid of the ridicule and censure placed upon us, if we entertain such exhibitions as these? Think of such conundrums as these propounded to a dencon of the First Baptist church, who ventured out for the first time: "Why is Jesus like a chicken? Because both were hatched in a manger." "Why is the Bible like the Police Gazette?" It is needless to say the Deacon retired in disgust, saying "What blasphemy."

How camp associations could harbor such sharks within their grounds, and expect the angel world to manifest through the media of honesty that might be there, when as Sister Eva A. Cassell, in her report of the Ayers Temple exposure says two-thirds of the so-called materialization is false or untrue—and we find that trumpet, slate-writing, and spirit-drawings are all so easily duplicated.

It behooves us as Spiritualists, to ply the brakes, before the engine of Spiritualism—or truth—runs to destruction through the breaking into our ranks of these wolves in sheep's clothing. It is worse than highway robbery; and the penalty ought to be so severe that an example made of a few of them would soon rid us of these serpents in disguise.

Let us bring out the hatchet of determination, and hew away until they will no longer find fields of labor. The longer we conceal what we know to be a truth, the less will be the opinions of all honest investigators. Spiritualism has never been injured by airing these exposures, but by concealing them. We invite all honest mediums to visit us, but we have through our past experience ripened from natural greenness into that state where we know right from wrong, and truth from deception.

MEDICAL MONOPOLY.

THE FREEDOM-LOVING PEOPLE OF MASSACHUSETTS STRUGGLING FOR LIBERTY—AN ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE OF THAT STATE FROM THE AMERICAN HEALTH CLUB, ILLUSTRATING THE FACT THAT THE TYRANT'S HANDS HAVE HAD THEM BY THE THROAT.

For almost sixty years prior to 1894 the practice of medicine was substantially free in this State, and during the last half of that period it was altogether free, while many of the States had oppressive medical laws.

Statistics show that the death rate in Massachusetts was lower after the old medical laws were repealed, and lower than in any State in which such laws existed.

An eminent physician and writer of the regular school, Dr. Lockhart, in an article on "Medical Legislation," in the Medical Brief, an old school journal of large circulation and great influence, says: "When, about 1830, the common people became aware of the iniquitous character of the medical laws on the statute books of the several States, the demand for repeal was so emphatic that in a few years not a vestige of such laws was left unrepealed." Dr. L. further says: "If, as it is claimed by the advocates of such laws, their object is to protect the people from incompetent practitioners, the death rate of the States in which such laws have been most rigidly enforced compared with the death rate where they have not existed, proves them to be an utter and egregious failure. Massachusetts is a notable example. For more than thirty years previous to 1894 the practice of medicine was absolutely free, yet the death rate was smaller than in other States having stringent medical regulations. The unlicensed quackery of Massachusetts was less pernicious than the licensed quakery of other States.

The people of Massachusetts were content to be free in the choice of physicians and all physicians who had confidence in their own ability to compete with others in curing the sick were satisfied with that condition, especially if they believed in the doctrine of equal rights to all, special privileges to none. But those doctors who do not sympathize with the American doctrine of equal rights, and those who dare not rely upon their own merits as physicians to secure them a living, want laws passed to give them a legal advantage over others.

Prof. J. J. Lawrence, A. M., M. D., editor of the Medical Brief, said in that journal for November, 1895: "Every time a restrictive law is proposed it is intended to benefit some one or more at the expense of others similarly situated. The man who wants laws passed to make things easy for him is a member of that large class who live by their wits. There is nothing solid about him. He resembles the borrowing friend, or the man who speculates in futures. He goes about skimming the cream from everybody's milk and pays no toll. The law which he has engineered to the statute books aids and abets in the process."

Now to the point: In 1894, an act, entitled "An act to provide for the registration of physicians and surgeons," passed the Legislature of Massachusetts. Te bill was prepared and lobbied through to its passage by a small self-constituted medical ring, and all, or nearly all of the members of that ring, now hold good paying positions, under that act. Those doctors had tried for many years to get their pet measure adopted, but they were successfully opposed by distinguished physicians, eminent clergymen, literary men and women of note, and prominent business men, until 1894. Their success then was due, in large measure, to the influence of Governor Greenhalge, and this powerful ally was secured by assurances from the ring that their bill had the endorsement of all the medical societies of the State, whereas we are informed that a very small number of the allopathic physicians endorsed it, still fewer homeopaths, and, so far as we have been able to learn, only one eclectic, and he is now President of the Board of Registration, created by the act.

As a matter of course these lobbyists pretended that the purpose of their bill was to suppress quackery, and save the people from its evils, in spite of themselves. The absurdity of this pretence is clearly shown by the that every quack who had been in practice in the State for three years prior to the passage of the act, was by that act raised to the legal level of the most scientific physician, by the payment of a fee of one dollar to this—now—official ring of doctors, while all scientific physicians, as well as quacks, who had not been in practice in this State three years before the act passed, have to pay ten dollars to the State medical ring for the privilege of advertising themselves as doctors of medicine.

This act is a menace to liberty, a foe to medical progress, a disgrace to the statutes of the State, and an arrant humbug. We have good old school authority for calling it a humbug. Dr. Lawrence says in his journal: "The cry for legislation to protect the medical profession and the people from quackery is arrant humbug. Nothing but the good sense of the profession itself, and the enlightenment of the people at large can do this."

In January, 1896, the American Health Club appointed a committee to prepare a bill to restore medical freedom to the people of this State, get it introduced into the Legislature, and press it to a passage. Their bill was introduced by Representative Douglass of Boston, on the petition of the Chairman of the Legislative Committee of the American Health Club. The bill reads as follows:

"Section 1. All citizens of Massachusetts, of sound mind, who are not under conviction for crime, shall be, and they are, entitled to the right and privilege to select their own physicians, to employ the same, and compensate them for their services.

"Section 2. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

"Section 3. That this act shall take effect from its passage."

It was referred to the Joint Public Health Committee of the House and Senate, where it came up for a hearing January 17. Through the courtesy of the Chairman of the Committee, Senator Hutchinson of Boston, the hearing was continued for three days, during which time speeches were made in the interest of the bill, and in opposition to the registration act it was intended to repeal, by Dr. T. A. Bland and Lawyer A. W. Crossley of the American Health Club Committee, Lawyer Jas. Morton, Dr. Moses W. Kidder, Ex-Health Officer of Lowell, Prof. Clark, Dean of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Dr. J. T. Simpson, and quite a number of others.

No person spoke against the bill, or in defense of the registration act, although the President, Dr. Miles, and the Secretary, Dr. Harvey, of the Board of Registration, were present, and were given full opportunity to be heard. At the very close, Senator Hutchinson said to Dr. Harvey: "If you desire to be heard on this bill, now is the time for you to speak, as this will be the last opportunity." To this invitation Dr. Harvey made the following short but very significant reply:

"As there have been no arguments presented, I have nothing to reply to. I think the committee understand us, and we understand the committee."

The committee reported against the bill, which fact gives good ground for the opinion that there did exist a previous understanding between a majority of the members of the committee and the officers of the Board of Registration that, despite all argument, the bill should be rejected and the registration act sustained.

At the request of the A. H. C., Mr. Douglass introduced the same bill into the Legislature again on the 25th of January, 1897, and again it was referred to the Joint Public Health Committee. It came up for a hearing on the 12th of February, and the Chairman of the Legislative Committee of the A. H. C., Dr. Bland, Lawyer James Morton, Mrs. Dr. A. E. Pratt and other friends of the bill were there prepared to advocate its passage. To their astonishment the Chairman of the Committee, Senator C. E. Folsom, refused to hear a word in favor of the bill, but after listening to a speech from Dr. Jeff. Cushing Gallison, a member of the committee, against the bill, and against hearing any arguments in its favor, and after asking Dr. Harvey a question which brought out a speech from him in line with Dr. Gallison's views, he announced his purpose to rule against hearing arguments for the bill.

That this program had been formed in advance by the parties who played their part so well, there is small room to doubt. Again Dr. Harvey could have said: "The committee understand us, and we understand the committee."

That the Boston medical trust, which monopolizes the offices created by the registration act, controls the committee through some silent influence, is clear. What the nature of that influence is, all are at liberty to have an opinion. In a criticism in the "Medical Brief" upon a circular letter sent to the doctors of Massachusetts in 1893, by that trust, the following significant sentences appear:

"The inventors of such contemptible schemes to deceive the people and their representatives are none too good to buy legislation where less expensive means fail. They are a blight on any business in which they may engage, and doubly disgrace the profession of medicine."

The American Health Club was organized in Boston in 1895, for the promotion of health, through the enlightenment of the people on all subjects related to the prevention and cure of disease. It has a large membership in this city and State, and more or less members in every State, comprising the most progressive physicians of all schools, clergymen of various denominations, literary men and women, public men—including Congressmen, Senators, etc.—and private citizens of intelligence, culture and progressive ideas. Its desire for the repeal of the medical registration act of 1894 is based upon the belief that that act is potent for evil and powerless for good. It presents this address to the people, with a firm conviction that if the full iniquity of that act could be brought to their attention, they would demand its repeal in terms so emphatic that their representatives would not dare to longer juggle with their interests, but would find themselves confronted with the alternative of restoring medical freedom to the people or retiring to the shades of private life.

The American Health Club is in line with the views of Dr. Benjamin Rush, famous both as a physician and patriot, who, a century ago, said: "Laws restricting the right to practice the healing art to one class of physicians, and denying to others equal privileges, constitute the Bastiles of our science. They are relics of monarchy, vestiges of despotism. They are wholly out of place in a republic."

Our forefathers rebelled successfully against king rule, and founded a government upon equal rights to all, special privileges to none. There were those who opposed the principles of democracy, and defended those of monarchy in the "times that tried men's souls." They were overpowered, but not convinced. Those Tories of the Revolutionary era have never failed of successors in this country, who if they cannot restore the rule of kings, are determined to establish a despotism of rings.

If they cannot have a monarchy they are resolved to establish an aristocracy in this land, dedicated to freedom. Their plan is to use the machinery of the republic to subvert it; and their method includes deception of the people by false pretences of devotion to their interests, control of political parties, and bribery of public officials. That there are various rings in this country persistently trying by those means to get full control of the governments of cities, states and nation, is a fact so patent that the people are seriously alarmed.

The facts here given show that medical rings are among the most active, persistent and dangerous to liberty and progress of any institutions of the ring genus with which we are called upon to deal. The A. H. C. has grappled with this evil with a determined purpose to extirpate it from American soil. To this end we have already had our bill introduced into Congress and various State Legislatures. We earnestly and confidently ask the co-operation of the press and the people in this herculean task.

PROF. BARRETT'S ADDRESS.

Other Subjects Treated of Especial Interest.

The Progressive Thinker is to be sent three months for 15 cents to all New subscribers.

Spiritualists, keep posted in current Spiritual events.

Why remain in ignorance? Why don't you keep posted in regard to the great Spiritualistic movement? Prof. Barrett delivered an address before the National Association of Spiritualists. It was an important one, and should be read by every Spiritualist in this broad land. We have had his address (which covers three pages of The Progressive Thinker) and five other important lectures and articles embodied in one paper, which we propose to send forth to illuminate the minds of those who have not had an opportunity to read them.

The first page of this paper contains h elecfure by Col. Ingersoll, given in a Chicago puipit. It scintillates throughout.

The third page has a splendid article on "Science versus Theology," in review of Andrew D. White's two superb volumes.

The fourth page has another excellent lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on "Spiritual Unfoldment."

The fifth page is very suggestive throughout, and is devoted to the "Hindoo Teachers—They Will Try to Capture the United States."

On the sixth page commences Prof. Barrett's admirable address, occupying three pages.

We will also, in connection with this paper, send out another equally as valuable. The first page contains an excellent lecture by Virchand R. Gandhi, a learned Hindoo. The remaining seven pages contain the wonderfully thrilling narrative (founded on facts) entitled, "The Night the Light Went Out," exhibiting many of the inside workings of the Catholic Church. Besides the address by Mr. Ghandi and the remarkable narrative, "The Night the Light Went Out," the first page has an excellent communication obtained through Ouija. The second page has a startling statement in reference to the "Romish Octopus—It Is Winding Its Poisonous Coils Around Washington." The poem on the same page, "The Sad Picture of a Wrecked Human Life," is wonderfully suggestive. The third page has a striking illustration showing how the Romish Church treats heretics. This page and the fourth also have a continuation of the "Romish Octopus." The fifth page has that remarkable poem, "St. Peter At the Gate." Every freethinker should read it. It is full of excellent "points." It also contains interesting facts in reference to the Romish Church and offices. The sixth, seventh and eighth pages have the following: "Monasteries and Convents—Where Those Alive Are Entombed." "Rider Haggard and the Immuring of Nuns." This paper alone is well worth the price of a year's subscription.

Every Spiritualist in this broad land should have these two papers. Our regular subscribers have already read their contents. For Fifteen cents we will send the Progressive Thinker for three months to all New trial subscribers and also send these two valuable papers.

Bear in mind that by New subscriber we mean one who has not been on our list for at least three months. Those of our present subscribers who wish to buy these two papers can have them both now for five cents. All of our regular subscribers have read their contents.

Send The Progressive Thinker three months to some friend, and thus get him interested in the cause. Stamps taken on small orders.

We sincerely hope that no Spiritualist will be dishonest enough, or so dishonorable, as to take advantage of this offer, by continuing his paper when the time expires, in the name of some member of his family (or some one else) in order to get the benefit of this 15 cent offer, on which the publisher does not make a cent.

VERILY, WHAT NEXT?

Under the head of "A New Programme," we announced a radical new departure from the general routine of work assumed by the average Spiritualist paper. We do not follow old established usages unless we are thoroughly convinced that they are the best, which is very rarely the case. We established the original dollar Spiritualist paper, and introduced a new era in the line of Spiritualistic journalism. Others have followed after us, but in all candor the only thing in which they have equalled us, is in the price of the paper—one dollar.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker on the following terms:

The Encyclopaedia of Death and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. The Next World Interviewed at 35 cts. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	$ .45
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	.45
The Next World Interviewed	.35
Total	$1.25

NO. OF PAGES IN EACH BOOK.

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	400
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	400
The Next World Interviewed	250

Each of these books is neatly and substantially bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and as prices go, are well worth one dollar per volume.

Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker.

Remember, please, that in order to obtain these three books for $1.25, you must send along a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker; the paper one year, and the three books costing $2.25. It is the subscription to the paper that enables us to send you these three books at cost.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

TO CONTRIBUTORS:—It is impossible to publish everything that comes to this office, however meritorious it may be, and no one should feel in the least offended because his (or her) article does not appear. Our space is limited, and we often deeply regret that certain articles are crowded out.

Bear in mind, please, that we cannot publish weekly reports of meetings. Whenever a change is made in speakers, or anything of special interest, send us a brief item, please. A great deal can be expressed in a dozen lines; but long reports will not be used. Meetings are of local interest only. We extend a cordial invitation to all speakers to send in their appointments to lecture, and general movements, which will be read by at least 40,000. We go to press early Monday morning, and items must reach us as early as Friday or Saturday in order to have immediate insertion.

Communications must always be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer, or no attention will be paid to them.

Will C. Hodge is located at No. 3 Elizabeth street, Chicago, Ill., and is open for engagement on liberal terms. Societies desiring the services of a first-class inspirational speaker and advocate of practical Spiritualism will do well to correspond with him. Will attend funerals.

Rev. Adam Clark, of Holland, Mich., a Methodist minister, is agitating a scheme to have the Christian churches of this country unite upon a national Christian emblem or banner, to be pinned onto all Protestant pulpits, carried at the head of funeral processions and Sunday-school parades. The plan is to use the colors red, white and blue—the red to represent the blood of Christ, the white purity, and the blue the bruises of Jesus. A friend suggests that they should make at least one-half of the banner blue, because the Christ principle gets more bruises from them than from any other class.

The New Orleans Picayune, March 1, says: "For several months Mrs. Dr. Hilligoss, of Anderson, Ind., has been in the city preaching to the members of the local branch of the order, and last evening she performed the rites after an eloquent address. For half an hour or more she spoke upon forms, ceremonies and baptism, and blended many beautiful thoughts into her eloquent talk. She pointed out the necessity for careful home training with the young, and called upon mothers to have a care with their children, that they might see the right way and believe in the growing belief of Spiritualism. She urged those just entering the belief to use their influence in teaching others not to enter a church which deprives one of being happy, but to enter the ranks of the Freethinkers. The four young maidens were seated on the platform, each robed in white, and when she had completed her address, one after another the applicants were brought forth and baptized in the name of Spiritualism, and she added, 'may the spirit guidance protect the young applicants throughout their entire life.' Then wreaths of white flowers were placed upon their heads and the ceremony ended. The young ladies were: Misses Mabel Kline, May Kline and Lydia Seidner."

Mrs. S. E. Reed is of the opinion that if we take anything off the rostrum it should be the invocations instead of the tests. People surge up to the tests at camp and other meetings, who would not listen to the long lectures. A good test medium giving strangers facts to take home with them—they will tell the same to others, if not publicly, in a secret way, and these others will try it, and soon a whole village will be leavened.

A joint discussion on Spiritualism and the Bible, between Rev. W. W. Crissel, of the Adventists, and C. E. Dent, Spiritualist, occurred at Schoolcraft, Mich., recently. Much interest was excited. It is said the reverend gentleman was so cornered up that he said he did not believe in a hell. The Adventist hell is a very different affair, however, from the standard orthodox hell, for it consumes—destroys—the wicked, root and branch, and so puts them out of misery, while orthodoxy roasts them eternally.

Julia Steelman-Mitchell, now serving the Unity Society at Milwaukee, will give week-day lectures, followed by test seances, in towns within a radius of a hundred miles on railroad lines. Terms reasonable. Address 558 Milwaukee street, Milwaukee, Wis.

R. M. Williams writes from Tallapoosa, Ga.: "We have had Mrs. Loe F. Prior with us two different times this winter, she having located at Atlanta, Ga., sent there by the N. S. A. Her lectures, psychometric readings and private seances (in trance) were very good. It was something entirely new to most of our people, quite an interest was manifested. I think much good will eventually be the result. I am Southern. Last winter I was in Alexandria, Ind., and investigated quite a considerable through W. C. Jessup, a trumpet medium. Mrs. Prior's visit was the result of this investigation."

Charles H. Thompson, of this city, writes: "The sublime philosophy of Spiritualism seems to me too sacred to be treated with the slightest levity, and when we realize that our loved ones who have passed over do return and hold sweet communion with and guide and direct us in our daily walks through life, it does seem a sacrilege that a certain class of fakes, for a few paltry dollars, should try and palm off on the honest seeker of the truth, pretended phenomena which they know to be false. I refer to that class of materializing mediums which infests all large cities, who for fifty cents or one dollar per head, resort to all sorts of mummery and trickery to gull their dupes out of their hard-earned money. In your issue of the 6th inst., you publish the last act of the farce lately presented before a Boston audience, namely, the Ayer's Temple case, in which Mr. Concannon and wife play the leading roles; and allow me to say I heartily concur with the finding of the jury, also in the conduct of those who conducted the raid, and in my opinion every true Spiritualist should not only be thankful the expose was made, but do his best to expose others of the same stamp, and by so doing help to exterminate these pests from our ranks. As I said before, I have been a convert to our beautiful philosophy for years, and have witnessed much of its phenomena, and fully understand that what so many think supernatural is but the result of natural law, not yet made plain to them. I know that spirits do communicate with us vocally and by means of the slate. I know that spirits etherealize. I have many times been a witness to both of these phenomena, but I have yet to know that spirits can take on matter in the shape of warm flesh and blood. If any materializing medium will at any time hold a seance at my residence in the presence of a few of my friends and produce a materialized spirit, I will not only make a public retraction, but will give the medium a purse containing $100."

Mrs. Frank Ainsley and Mrs. L. C. Bernier, trustees, write from Oakland, Cal.: "The First Christian Spiritual Society of this city has been holding meetings regularly right along, and, true to its principles, is striving to spread the light of truth and lead men into the way that leads to true liberty. For the past few months Mrs. C. Cornelius, a good test and inspirational medium, has occupied our rostrum twice each Sunday, and through her ministrations our society has held together, gained in numbers and been the means of setting many a skeptic to thinking. We feel that we can say that, by her unselfish and earnest efforts in behalf of our loved cause, Mrs. Cornelius has won a right to our highest esteem and regard. Sunday, March 7, a meeting is to be held at Loring Hall, 11th and Clay streets, for the purpose of taking steps whereby the many Spiritualists of Oakland may be united under one charter—united in heart and object for it is felt out here in the 'Golden West' that if Spiritualism would be respected, and the rights of its mediums and workers recognized, 'organization and harmony' must be the watchword. We can command no respect unless we combine and live in a manner to merit it."

Thomas M. Locke, president of the Philadelphia Spiritualist Society, writes: "Brother E. W. Sprague and his good wife have been serving our society with great success during the past month. His audiences have increased largely every Sunday during his stay with us. Brother Sprague is one of the most earnest and zealous workers in our cause. He is ably assisted by his wife, giving spirit messages. I think the National Association acted wisely in securing his services as a missionary. There seems to be a demand for workers of his class. He is eminently qualified to build up weak societies. His style of oratory, blended with a wonderful magnetic force and power, will make him a success wherever he goes, and with all these qualifications he loves the work—as he told me in conversation a few days since. Any one of the old Spiritualists who remember our arisen brother, E. V. Wilson, one of his controls, can readily appreciate and recognize the value of such speakers on our platforms to-day. The world needs just such enthusiastic workers. He and his good wife came among us as strangers, this being their first visit to Philadelphia, but they have made for themselves many friends, so that we dislike to part with them. I am happy to say we have secured their services for two months next year. They leave us to renew their labors in New York State, and we predict for them great success in the dissemination of our beautiful philosophy."

The Grand Ledge Spiritualists' camp will open its session for 1897, Thursday, July 22. First formal exercises, Sunday, July 25, to Sunday, August 22, inclusive, with the following program of speakers: Dr. J. C. Batdorf, Mrs. Marian Carpenter, Anna L. Robinson, Mrs. Martha E. Root, Dr. A. B. Spinney, Moses Hull, Dr. F. Schermerhorn, Hon. L. V. Moulton, Mrs. A. E. Sheets and others. Full programs will be issued about May 1. All inquiries addressed to J. P. Russell, secretary. Box 805, Grand Ledge, Mich.

B. V. S. writes: "I spent twenty-eight years of my best manhood in preaching a man-made creed. Eight years ago I became doubtful of the correctness of my position, and after five years of careful study I threw off the yoke of mental bondage and am now free from all logical nostrums and heathen myths. I am now in a condition to investigate farther, as I want truth pure and simple. I am now past the three score and ten mile-post in life."

A member of the Spiritual society of Breedsville, Mich., writes: "Mr. Frank Chamberlin, of Marcellus, Mich., materializing medium, with his wife, visited at the home of E. W Williams, and made many hearts glad with his wonderful seances, and attended our meeting in Society Hall on Sunday, conducted by the guides of Lucy J. Williams—a trance speaker who has developed here in our midst."

Professor Harry W. Abbott will give a series of inspirational lectures, Sundays at 2:30 p. m. at Handal Hall Building, 40 E. Randolph Street. Residence 4302 Langley Ave. Flat 5.

Col. James Freeman writes from Bloomington, Ill.: "Dr. E. H. Denslow of Sturgis, Mich., who is missionary for the N. S. A., and has been filling engagements at Ft. Worth, and other places in Texas, also at Kansas City, Mo., has just been spending a week with us here. He is a grand inspirational speaker, and his guides gave two excellent discourses before the Bloomington Progressive Spiritualist Association, to full houses of delighted hearers. He has just left us for points in Indiana, and we bespeak for him the kind consideration and careful attention of all lovers of truth and progress, wherever he may sojourn. Our Association here is in a prosperous condition, and is having a healthy growth. Professor Charles Wesley Peters lectures for us every Sunday evening."

W. J. Huckett writes: "I am running a series of spiritual meetings here at Pueblo, Col., and have had Mrs. E. F. J. Bullene lecturing for February and March. We consider her the finest lecturer we have had here. Her subject yesterday was 'The Philosophy of Death.' The audience was intensely pleased with the lecture."

Mrs. Dr. D. White, trance, writing and healing medium, is now located at 2902 Olive Street, St. Louis, Mo.

Moses Hull speaks every Sunday in April and May, with the exception of the first Sunday in April, in Lima, Ohio. Address accordingly.

Dr. C. H. Figuers writes: "The First Spiritual Society of Palmetto, Fla., was reorganized March 3d, there being twenty-five members present. Much enthusiasm was manifested, and the election of the officers is an evidence that business is meant. The following officers were elected: H. Houghton, president; J. K. Parrish, vice-president; N. A. Short, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Harry Kinsman, treasurer; Levi Jones, G. E. Koons, Harry Kinsman, Mrs. J. K. Parrish, and Mrs. H. B. Houghton, M. D., trustees. Steps were taken to secure a lot on which to build a hall, and enough money to buy lumber for same has been secured, and in the near future the Spiritualists of Palmetto will have a house where the gospels of Spiritualism will be given to the hungry, craving human souls. The work here is in good hands and will grow. A Childrens' Lyceum has been arranged for, and will be under way in a short time."

Professor Geo. W. Walrond, trance clairvoyant and test medium, is at present actively employed in Denver, Col., where he has earned the reputation of being able to demonstrate the higher truths of Spiritualism to one and all. He is open to teach pure and scientific occultism in all its branches. His permanent address is the Granite Building, Denver, Col.

Henry Plangeman writes: "I drop you a few lines to inform you of the grand and noble work of the inspirational speaker, Mrs. Jennie Hagan Jackson, has been doing in Ft. Worth, Texas, since the January 1st. She has converted me to the beautiful truths of Spiritualism. I trust and hope that her work may continue for many years. The First Society of Spiritualists, and particularly Judge Wray, are to be congratulated in securing this noble woman, and my earnest wish is that we may be fortunate enough to have her with us every winter, for at least three or four months."

Spiritualists of New York State, remember the State Convention to be held at Syracuse, April 13, 14, 15. If you have no society, call a meeting of Spiritualists in your vicinity and elect delegates to attend. Try and secure Mr. E. W. Sprague to speak for one meeting before the convention, as he is to travel over the State. Write Frank Walker, Hamburg, N. Y., regarding above, send him your name and that of all other Spiritualists in your vicinity, and he will send them circulars relating thereto. He is desirous of obtaining the names and addresses of all Spiritualists in that State.

C. S. D. writes from Moberly, Mo.: Moberly (Mo.) Spiritualists are awaking to the necessity of good mediums visiting their city. On Monday night, March 1, a parlor seance was held at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Sleotte, under the guidance of Professors Stinson and White. They gave character readings, numerous tests and other satisfactory manifestations of spirit power. Moberly is a good field for mediums of different phases, but those not recommended or recognized by an organization can do no good in this city."

Mrs. Ella G. Magoon writes: "We are at present engaged in labors at Marshall, Tex., where there are a number of pleasant friends, workers and intelligent investigators of our philosophy, and a good field for work in the way of upbuilding, with of course, some drawbacks in the opposition offered through superstitious bigotry."

Joseph Chapman writes: "Your paper grows better and better all the time, if that were possible. Long may you live to spread the truth."

Ben F. and Mattie E. Hayden are open for engagements within one hundred miles of Indianapolis, Ind. Terms reasonable. Correspondence solicited from those who need lectures, private readings or public tests. Address them at 185 Newman street, Indianapolis, Ind.

The Meadville Daily Tribune speaks as follows of Hon. A. B. Richmond: "Mr. A. B. Richmond, in legal and literary articles, is well known. He was educated as a chemist and has become an expert toxicologist as well. He ranks among the first criminal lawyers of Pennsylvania and is well known as the author of 'Leaves from the Diary of An Old Lawyer.'"

There will be special anniversary exercises at the Church of the Spirit, Sunday, March 28, at 620 North Clark street, at 2:45 and 7:45 p. m. Mrs. S. F. DeWolf, Dr. W. H. Blair, Mrs. Sarah Bromwell, Miss Desmond, Mrs. Nash, Prof. Reynolds, Mrs. Wilson, and many others will assist. All phases of mediumship will be given. Dr. Willis Edwards, pastor.

D. B. Jimerson, the Indian medium, is going into Ohio and Indiana this spring. He wishes to hear from Corry and Meadville, Pa., and some societies in Ohio. Terms very moderate. Direct all letters to him before April 3, as follows: Bason, Genesee county, N. Y.

On Wednesday evening, March 10, a grand reception was tendered Mrs. Marian Carpenter, pastor of the First National Society of Detroit, Mich., by the members and friends of that society who were anxious to express the pleasure it gave them to have their pastor again in their midst. Mrs. Carpenter has just returned from Washington, D. C., where she had been engaged during February lecturing before the First National Society, and, as an indication of her merit, we are pleased to note that she has been engaged to appear before the same society next year.

Secretary writes from Wayland, Mich.: "We are known here as the Barlow Lake Spiritual Society, and were organized three years ago by that grand worker, G. H. Brooks, Elgin, Ill. We received our charter on the 3d day of April, 1894, and have continued to hold our meetings regularly, or nearly so, since our organization at the People's Church, Bowen's Mills, Barry county, Mich. Our yearly meeting occurred on the 7th of the present month, and we had a good attendance despite the bad roads. Mrs. Nellie Padgham, of Allegan, Mich., delivered the address which was very fine. I wish to say to other societies who have not a speaker, that they will make no mistake in engaging her to fill their rostrum."

T. W. Eichelberger writes: "The Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism will be celebrated in a manner worthy and befitting the occasion, by the First Spiritualist Society of Chicago, at the Masonic Home Temple, 3120 Forest avenue. Sunday, the 18th of March, will be devoted to the happy event. Mrs. Ada Foye, the pastor of the society, who is one of the truest and best phenomenal test mediums in the world, will give two of her test seances, afternoon and evening of that day, and with the other mediums and speakers that have been invited, the occasion will be one that will be enjoyable in every sense. Between the hours of 5 and 8 p. m. the ladies of the society will give a supper in the banquet hall of the temple. We corially invite all speakers and mediums, local and those from abroad who may be in the city upon that day, to come and join with us. You will be heartily welcomed. Let us make the occasion one that will eclipse all of its predecessors.

Maria Baker, writes from Muncie, Ind.: "Mrs. Joseph Mendenhall, the materializing medium, is having great success. Mrs. Harry Crossfield is meeting with success. In the near future she will be as good as Mrs. Luther Colby. Mr. J. W. Strange, of Marion, Ind., the trumpet medium, was here during the month of February. He held circles with good success. Mr. George Runion is having success in trumpet speaking here and in adjoining towns. Mrs. Laura Morris, of Chesterfield, spoke in the First Spiritualist Temple this month with good success."

"The Bridge Between Two Worlds." By Abby A. Judson. This book is dedicated to all earnest souls who desire, by harmonizing their physical bodies and their physical bodies with universal nature and their souls with the higher intelligences, to come into closer connection with the purer realms of the Spirit-World. It is written in the sweet spiritual tone that characterizes all of Miss Judson's literary works. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents.

Behold! The camp-meeting will soon be heard of again, and the tourists will find a large number to select from.

"I feel in myself the future life," said Victor Hugo, illustrating the fact that heaven is within, in a very great measure.

We don't think that mediums will ever have to pay a license in Chicago. While The Progressive Thinker is fighting their battles not one out of ten take any Spiritualist paper whatever—a sad commentary on human nature.

Eight Theosophical Crusaders have arrived in San Diego, Cal., where they propose to start a movement that will soon encompass the whole world—with what?

T. A. B. speaks of Mrs. Bliss's materializing in Boston. The chief feature of the evening was a materialized spirit robed in garments so beautifully illuminated that they literally blazed as though sown with the most brilliant diamonds.

Materialization seances continue to be a "bone of contention." The medium who is charged with fraud in one place, however flagrant, finds admirers in the next town or State, who swear by him or her.

"Why not give fraudulent mediumship free rein—it does those good who believe it genuine, while it don't injure those in the least who are cognizant of the wrong being perpetrated," says an enthusiastic Spiritualist. He continues: "If I had my way, no trickster should be exposed, until the barnacle became so rotten it would expose itself." Verily, when doctors disagree, how shall any poor editor decide?

It is well-known in Chicago, that Loie Fuller whose presence on the stage is enough to draw a full house, is a Spiritualist. She was a member of the lyceum in this city. She has danced her way into recognition.

Mrs. Tingley who is now dishing up theosophy to those who desire it, was formerly a medium in New York City. Madame Blavatsky at one time was a Spiritualist. How a medium can go back on her mediumship, or a Spiritualist on her belief, is one of the mysteries of the 19th century.

Maud Lord Drake has been holding forth at Los Angeles, Cal.

Keep it before the great mass of Spiritualists that not one of three hundred of the number take any Spiritualist paper. This accounts for the death of about 100 of them, and the sickly condition of some of the rest.

We frequently see in the various Spiritualist journals a desire expressed by the editor to be remembered in "your will." That is in bad taste. A Spiritualist paper has no more right to expect to be remembered in "your will" than any other poor mortal of earth. We never could have it beat into our brains why a Spiritualist editor should continually cry out, "Remember me in your wills." Verily when will Spiritualist editors learn a little practical business sense.

Isabella Beecher Hooker says: "There is one very comforting fact that we learn from Spiritualism. It is that the suffering in the spirit-world is reformatory, and not everlasting; that erring and perverse souls, when they have suffered for a time, perhaps for years, and have come to see and feel ashamed of their evil-doing, repent, and are uplifted and forgiven, good spirits helping them to find the way to the light."

"I do not believe the great fish swallowed Jonah," says the Rev. Lyman Abbott, who stepped into Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's squeaking shoes. Alas! that this eminent man should just admit a fact known to Spiritualists right along. What a snail-like thinker indeed, to come to such a conclusion so late.

As to Col. Ingersoll, it is claimed he has constructed nothing! He has made, however, a vast heap of orthodox rubbish for some one to clear away—a dirty job! He has done an excellent humanitarian work.

The Rev. Abbott, who has been filling Henry Ward Beecher's old pulpit, has lately been trying to find an accurate and trustworthy definition of death. Poor fellow, any kind of a Spiritualist can tell you all about it. Why don't you show good judgment in your seeking of knowledge?

The tender mercies of Providence as manifested in a cyclone, is sometimes very touching—so said the old fellow that a fence rail hit, out west on one blowing occasion.

Divine Providence and the famine in India can't agree, from the fact that the poor Hindoos don't like that method of dying.

When Curran White was one night, lying on his bed awake, self-poised, and not at all startled or alarmed, a great light flooded the room, and soon came before him a group of a score of persons, some friends from the other life and some unknown. The group opened, and from it came that wife; not helpless and old, but erect, radiant, as in youth. With elastic steps she walked to his bedside, laid a hand on his shoulder, and her clear eyes looked down into his in the old way—tender and true. She soon stepped back and vanished, as did all the group, with the fading light, and left ineffable peace and joy in his heart. He had longed for some surety of her health in the higher life, and always said that she came to remove every shade of doubt from his mind.

A thought wave is asked for, to be sent by all patriots on March 27, "All-Souls Communion Day," from noon to 1 p. m., and also on the 27th of every succeeding month—that wars may cease and freedom prevail everywhere; that to-day millions may be employed and suffering and want may be known no more. Would it not be better to try a thought wave on the orthodox God, and have him send rain when needed to starving India? Send your thought wave along to him, and try something easy first.

Lucy A. Mallory thinks "the sun worshipers had a truer conception of the origin of Divine power than have the popular religionists of the day," which is not saying anything in favor of either party, which you can put your finger on.

The printer misquoted when he put in type the word "ridicule" for "rival." The extract should be as follows: "We do not expect to 'rival' any of the Spiritualist papers." It was taken from the Leaflet of the Central New York Spiritualist Association, that is aspiring to establish a camp at Freeville, N. Y.—and we hope they will succeed, of course.

Mrs. J. A. Chapman says: Prof. W. M. Lockwood, of Chicago, Ill., the distinguished Spiritualist physicist, opened a month's engagement with the Spiritual Union, of Norwich, Ct., Sunday, March 7, giving two grand lectures in Grand Army Hall upon 'The Spiritual Forces in Nature.' Mr. Lockwood being perfectly familiar with his work, presents a class of data not only instructive, but exceedingly interesting to the auditors. While he strikes heavy blows at old-time dogmas and superstitions, he presents a beautiful philosophy, based upon the eternal principles of nature, which will stand the test of scientific investigation by any scholar in the world. In his argument Prof. Lockwood demonstrates these great principles in so clear and comprehensive a manner that a child of average intelligence may understand."

THE PSYCHICAL RESEARCH Society meeting last week was attended by an audience far too large for the hall. All the usual pillars and notabilities were present, with the welcome addition of Professor Oliver Lodge. The great attraction was, of course, the Presidential Address of Mr. Crookes, F. R. S. We propose, next week, to give our impressions of it. At present we can only say that it was a very subtile and very scientific attempt to bring home to us all the fact that we know next to nothing, and that what we seem to know is really only the result of "accidental environments." The tone of the whole was, perhaps, somewhat agnostic; but, as against the vehement or solid materialist, who is so very certain, this may be useful or, at all events, necessary.

DUPLEX INDIVIDUALITY.

Dr. Forbes Winslow's "Westminster Gazette" article on "Duplex Individuality" has hopeful signs in it. It deals with a very grave form of mental infirmity, but there is actually in it no suggestion urging to confinement in a lunatic asylum. Moreover, there are strong indications of an enlarged acquaintance with abnormal mental action, falling short of lunacy. The Doctor not only recognizes "duplex individuality" but the "hypnotic trance state," as constant if comparatively infrequent factors in not actually insane life. We may yet find him admitting that one may have certain spiritualistic experiences without lay'ng one's self open to the risk of imprisonment as a lunatic.

DUPLEX INDIVIDUALITY.

Dr. Winslow tells a good story of a certain merchant in America who was suddenly missed, and was not heard of for six months. He then turned up in a dazed state, utterly unable to account either for his disappearance or to state what he had been doing. Here is his own story:

"I was feeling very tired and thoroughly fatigued after a very busy day in the city, so I went to my state-room immediately upon going aboard the boat and changed my clothes. Up to that time I was thoroughly conscious, but after that I can recall nothing; all was oblivion, till six months later, when I came suddenly to myself in a distant city in the South, where I knew no one. I found myself driving a fruit wagon in the street. I was utterly astonished. Why I was there, how and when I got there, where I came from, and what I had been doing, were puzzling questions to me. Upon inquiry I learnt that I had been at work there for some time. My life, since I was in that state had been an absolute blank to me. I can give no account of myself during that period of time. I started at once for Virginia, but on the way I again lost consciousness, though only for a day or two. When further on my way home, I felt so utterly worn out I stopped in a certain town, and went to the house of a very near relative. From there I was taken home. I was in a half-dazed, confused condition, and remained so some days longer. I am now feeling well and all right." "This," says Dr. Winslow, "is not an isolated case: for many are recorded of this 'duplex individuality.'" We hope the new knowledge will be of service to him.

From Harbinger of Light, Melbourne, Australia.

I BECAME A SPIRITUALIST rather more than five and twenty years ago, after a careful investigation of the phenomena, which I commenced almost with a predetermination not to be convinced; and with a very decided impression that Spiritualists might be roughly divided into two classes—knaves and fools. I finished my investigations with something like a feeling of shame and remorse that I should have so presumptuously misjudged some millions of human beings, whose honesty and intelligence—speaking of them as a whole—are unimpeachable.

I AM A SPIRITUALIST, because the proofs of spirit-return, are such as to be altogether overwhelming in quantity and quality.

I AM A SPIRITUALIST, because the higher teachings we receive from spiritual sources are a synthesis of all that is noblest and best in the philosophy and ethics of Zoroaster, Brahma, Buddha, Confucius, Socrates, Plato, Jesus of Nazareth, Seneca, Marcus Aurelius, Plotinus and the Neo-Platonists.

I AM A SPIRITUALIST, because the doctrines inculcated by our supernal teachers, find an immediate and fervid response in my own reason and conscience.

I AM A SPIRITUALIST, because no other faith, no other system, no other explanation of the origin of the Universe, of man, of evil, and of the inequalities of human character, circumstances and capacity, is so simple, so rational and so obvious, as that which is supplied by Spiritualism.

I AM A SPIRITUALIST, because my conception of God, our Father, has been raised immeasurably; my consciousness of what I owe to my fellow creatures has been stimulated enormously; and my feeling of reverence for His supreme perfection, His infinite love, His absolute justice, and His amazing goodness, has been inexpressibly deepened and strengthened.

I AM A SPIRITUALIST, because its beautiful truths are entirely free from mysticism; are as transparent as the ether; are strictly consonant with our innate perceptions of what is right, and just and reasonable; and are such as are comprehensible by childhood itself.

From The Spiritual Review, London, Eng.

THE SPIRITUAL REVIEW occupies an honorable place in the British Museum; in the libraries of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Edinburgh and Dublin, and in nearly all the Young Men's Christian Associations in Ireland.

Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten expresses herself as "liking our little paper very much;" "there are few," she says, "if any, of the articles I do not agree with." Our object is to touch responsive chords in the hearts of all.

OUR DEVELOPING CIRCLES on Sunday evenings are beginning to show signs of very great progress. There is a marvelous power in the cabinet—highly conducive to the production of spirit-forms. Mediums are developing rapidly. A new medium last Sunday gave a remarkable test.

WITHOUT A CABINET.

Mrs. Esperance and Mathew Fidler paid a flying visit to England a week or two ago, and gave us a friendly call. Mrs. Esperance is one of the few remarkable mediums for materialization. A seance was held spontaneously, without a cabinet, and the spirit of a well-known journalist materialized. This is far more convincing than when the medium is curtained off.

CONQUERING ALL COUNTRIES.

Madame De Christmas, editress of a Danish journal, writes: "The main point is that we Spiritualists ought, all of us, to help each other in the act of conquering all countries for our cause." That is what will yet be accomplished. Spiritualism is taking hold of the hearts of the people, and the most obstinate power will yet have to submit to its increasing strength.

From The Freethinker, London, England.

ACTING PROVIDENCE.

A lady of my acquaintance was once sitting on a public seat fronting the sea at a watering place in the south of England. An elderly lady took a seat near her and opened a conversation, in the course of which she remarked how good it was of Providence to vary the weather in different places, so that when it was wretched in one place a person might remove to another.

HE DOESN'T PAY EXPENSES.

"Yes," said the first lady, "but Providence doesn't pay railway fare and hotel bills." This was a smart hint to the other lady that she had been generalizing, rather selfishly, from the experience of a favored class of people.

THE POOR DEVILS who live where the weather is "insufferable" have to put up with it, having no means of escape. They must take what Providence sends, and if it half kills them they must grin and bear it, or else get drunk or attend revival meetings, or indulge in some other form of delirium. That pious old lady was probably one of the world's do-nothings, and an optimist from a mixture of privilege and cowardice. But after all she took a view of Providence which is extremely common. It is a natural one to the wealthy classes.

GLADSTONE AND PROVIDENCE.

Mr. Gladstone writes eloquently on the beneficent care of Providence in fitting up the earth for man's habitation. Yet people are burnt at the equator and frozen near the poles. The really temperate parts of the earth's surface—if we except the sea, which man has not yet learnt to inhabit—are comparatively meagre.

PROVIDENCE AND DESTRUCTION.

Then there are volcanoes that have not finished erupting; now and then an earthquake, or a big tidal wave, destroys thousands of people; snakes and wild beasts, in India alone, kill enough men and women every year to populate a fair-sized town; sometimes the weather is diabolically perverse, parching the crops with too much heat, or rotting them with too much wet; while at other times an unforeseen pestilence breaks out and ravages whole nations. Yes, the argument of Mr. Gladstone is essentially the same as that of the pious old lady at the seaside. You may always be sure of the man who employs it—unless he is a professional exhorter—that he knows very little of physical geography, or that he is blessed with a very comfortable independence.

PROVIDENCE AND INDIA.

Those who can see evidence of beneficent wisdom controlling the affairs of this planet must be gifted with the occult powers of the fabled Mahatmas. Look at the present condition of India, for instance; a magnificent country, so far as scenery and natural resources are concerned—a country, the famous missionary poet said, where every prospect pleases and only man is vile. India is often afflicted with drought; that is to say, the people are afflicted with it, for the land itself does not care a straw about the matter. The rain that should fall on the rice fields of India is diverted to other parts of the world, where it is not wanted, and where it is a curse instead of a blessing. The result is that, as India is peopled right down to the level of subsistence, millions of people are brought face to face with starvation.

PROVIDENCE AND STARVATION.

For many weeks past the English newspapers have contained most distressing accounts of the famine that is now desolating portions of that unhappy land. Telegraphing from Jabalpur on February 8, the correspondent of the Daily News says: "I observed a girl five years old who weighed only ten pounds, and several adults actually scaled less than four stone. The skin in these and many other cases was so tightly drawn over the face as to show the formation of the skull, while the limbs were so emaciated that the articulation of the joints was visible." What a frightful picture of human suffering! And all because the power called Providence (if such a power indeed exist) has forgotten, or deliberately declined, to send them a little rain out of the abundant reservoirs of this world.

Joys Beyond the Threshold

A SEQUEL TO THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH was writen to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled in the bosom of etherial space. "BEYOND THE THRESHOLD" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy; claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price $1.25. For sale at this office.

VOLNEY'S RUINS —AND— THE LAW OF NATURE,

TO WHICH IS ADDED

Volney's Answer to Dr. Priestly, a Biographical Notice by Count Daru, and the Zodiacal Signs and Constellations by the Editor;

Also, a Map of the Astrological Heavens of the Ancients.

Printed on heavy paper, from new plates, in large, clear type, with portrait and illustrations. One vol., post 8vo, 248 pages; paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This is undoubtedly one of the best and most useful books ever published. It eloquently advocates the best interests of mankind, and clearly points out the sources of human ignorance and misery. The author is supposed to meet in the ruins of Palmyra an apparition or phantom, which explains the true principles of society, and the causes of both the prosperity and the ruin of ancient states. A general assembly of the nations is at length convened, a legislative body formed, the source and origin of religion, of government, and of laws discussed, and the Law of Nature—founded on justice and equity—is finally proclaimed to an expectant world.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of the distinguished author, speaker and medium,

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

T. W. M.: Q. Henry Seward Hubbard in his book, "Beyond," says "there are very large numbers of people who, the moment the brain becomes quiescent in sleep, enter at once on the most active part of their daily existence," and that "the extent to which we influence others or are influenced by them, during our sleeping hours, very few realize, because unable to recall, when waking, the experiences of the night just passed." Are these statements true, and how can we know them to be so?

A. In true sleep there is absolute rest of the mind. The pulsations of the heart lessen, for this is the only rest that ever-laboring organ can have. There is withdrawal of the blood from the brain, and the processes by which muscular and nervous tissue are broken down are suspended, while those of renovation are active. The worn tissues are rebuilt, and normally when this approaches completion the heart resumes its labor, the increased flow of blood to the brain arouses the mind from its coma-like rest, and it is said the person awakes. There may be disturbance of digestion; the heart may not slow up for rest; the nervous strain may have been so great that it cannot be quieted with nature's anodyne; the muscles overtaxed contract and their lacerated nerves cry out against sleep. Then these conditions of the body are reflected in the sleep which is no more than partial unconsciousness. Such dreams furnish a remarkably reliable means of diagnosis. There are psychic dreams which are independent of bodily conditions, and at rare intervals there may be a superior sensitiveness or mediumship during what is called sleep which is not possessed when waking. But these states are not true sleep, which is dreamless, and profoundly unconscious, and the spirit is held in abeyance to the condition of the physical body, and rests with it.

To assert that the spirit at sleep enters into an active existence, is like claiming that when a caterpillar coils itself in its web to rest, the butterfly which it will some time evolve, goes out winging the fields of air, returning when the worm awakes. This is absurd, because the transformation of the caterpillar into the butterfly has not taken place, and it is equally absurd to assert that the spirit is enjoying an active life, while its physical body sleeps.

J. Steadman: Q. Is not Spiritualism the everlasting gospel (good-will and glad tidings) that is now being declared to all the world?

A. As the truth it is a gospel, and as the expression of truth is expansive and progressive, it must be everlasting. Things that grow continue. The cessation of growth is death. The old systems, by their claim of infallibility and divine source, cannot absorb the new—cannot change, except in contradiction with their claims. Spiritualism absorbs what is true in the old and having the power of unlimited growth, unfettered by divine commands, or dogmatic creeds, it is boundless in its scope, and without limitation of time.

Hattie E. Rix, Williamston, Mich.: Q. (1) Could our public lecturers do a greater or more beneficent work than to use their gifts in the cause of labor reform during this time of commotion, suffering and poverty?

(2) Is there anything more noble or grander than to educate the masses as to the causes of the hard times and the peaceful remedy in their own hands? Doubtless there are many speakers who do not understand these questions. Considering the present conditions, is it not their duty to make it a study by reading reform literature, etc? Ought they not to give practical teaching on the subject of treatment of "Our Dumb Animals," speaking thus a word for those who cannot speak for themselves?

A. The idea prevalent that Spiritualism is a religion, and that its lecturers were comparable with gospel ministers, has had a tendency to keep them from grappling with the living questions of the day, aside from those bearing directly on religion. This tendency has grown stronger, and even the efforts to show the errors of the church are depreciated. The iconoclasts of the early days of Spiritualism are dead or silent and we have an approachment to the church forms, if not beliefs, in "ordinations of pastors," "christening of infants," and the calling of societies "churches," flummery and show, in vain attempt to conciliate church feeling by making believe that we are something which we are not, and do not wish to be. The great living issues unfortunately are complicated with partisan politics, and a lecturer called before a promiscuous audience would be wise indeed not to offend one party or the other. Yet such themes might be treated from standpoints above all parties. It must not be forgotten that when societies engage a speaker to speak the spiritual philosophy, they expect lectures on that subject, just as Methodist churches would expect their ministers to preach only on Methodist lines, and not descant on Presbyterianism. If a lecturer proposed to take other themes, he should announce the fact.

This correspondent is right in saying that there is need, and that the speakers should prepare themselves on all the great issues of the living present. There is not the preparation demanded, even in the Spiritual field. This reminds me of a letter lately received from one who has been a minister of the gospel. He attended a circle, became a convert to Spiritualism, threw up his ministerial office and decided on entering the Spiritual field. He wrote, asking me to get him a class in my town, in spiritual science, charging the low fee of $10 for twelve lessons. I plainly replied that his experience did not warrant his assuming the capabilities of a teacher, and that after he had devoted a year or more to the study, I should feel more inclined to get him the class. The training of a minister might make a glib speaker, but was the worst for acquisition of spiritual knowledge. It is such lecturers that drive the more critical to the liberal churches.

To the last question, emphatic affirmation can be made. Spiritualism comes to save, by knowledge, from ignorance, and as such a savior should begin with the children, and make them tender and merciful by inculcating lessons of mercy. How better begin than with loving care and gentleness to the dumb animals, that are our helpers and friends?

George T. Angell says that among many thousand criminals, but twelve ever owned a pet animal. This shows that those who treat animals kindly, treat their fellow-men in the same way, and thus are on the road which leads away from crime. So vital is this considered that the progressive lyceums are urged to take it up, at least every fourth session, and a special work for that day is prepared by the Lyceum Guide, and a contest in humane speaking, at least once a year.

Geo. Tyler, Willow Springs: Q. (1) Why do all the secular papers appear so averse to Spiritualism? What of the exposures they publish?

(2) Have we ever had a president who believed in Spiritualism?

A. (1) The publishers of newspapers have one main object—to make sales; conscienceless, soulless to everything else. And the abuse of a cause in minority, pays better than its support. Of the exposures made from time to time, some are warranted, and are blessings to the cause; others expose the credulity and ignorance which accepts them as true. The confessions of "retired clairvoyants," etc., if not concocted by reporters, are from self-confessed frauds, whose lives have been given to deception. Why should they be believed? The only exposure they make is their ignorance of the genuine clairvoyance they sought to imitate. When Spiritualism becomes popular, the newspapers will be loud in their praise, and their headlines of commendation will be more glaring than those are now of its condemnation.

(2) Abraham Lincoln was a Spiritualist, and placed great reliance on the messages he received.

A. D. Harrison: Q. I think it is taught by most physiologists that the heart circulates the blood; and by astronomers that the earth and other heavenly bodies are kept in their orbits by the centripetal and centrifugal forces. Are they not both erroneous theories?

A. The heart is the central organ of the circulation of the blood, but the capillaries have an important part. Centripetal and centrifugal forces are only names of certain directions of force, and do not explain the cause. Centripetal force is attraction to the center; centrifugal force, the repulsion which balances it. Newton proceeded in his wonderful mathematical calculations, as though these forces were imparted by the hand of God, when he, having created the worlds, pitched them into space; and little knowledge has since been gained of the cause of their motions. The explanation is only a statement of the fact.

So far as the law of gravitation is formulated it is as demonstrated as two and two are four. It is amusing to see the persistency with which the theory of gravitation is assailed by those who have just enough learning to make their ignorance conspicuous. The "hollow globe" and startling explanations of the creation, come up with periodical certainty and drop into merited forgetfulness. The "great scientists" who promulgate these wild dreams, were never heard of before, and are not heard of afterwards. When it is considered that by the laws demonstrated by mathematics, eclipses of the sun and moon may be determined ten thousand or a hundred years hence to the fraction of a second; the position of the planets, their occultations or oppositions, for unlimited time, as accurately determined; the denial of the laws by which this sublime achievment of thought is attained is a pitiable exhibition of ignorance.

D. R. A: Q. Do spirits require rest?

A. The spirit requires rest. When fatigued by activity or close unremitting study, it is necessary for it to retire within itself and take repose. It is not the body alone which sleeps, but the spirit also, and when freed from the body the necessity for sleep remains. It cannot go on in gigantic labors without intervals of rest. This gives a zest to life; for arising from repose after fatigue, fresh and strong, adds very much to the enjoyment of living beings.

We cannot understand how the processes of activity and rest apply to spirits, for with us this is complicated with the breaking down and renewal of cells in the various tissues brought into activity. Spirits have the power, which we have not, of imbibing—this word represents the process perhaps as well as any known word can—forces directly from their source, and not through the medium of digestion and assimilation of food. Perhaps it is not too wild a fancy to expect that sometime man may acquire this knowledge, and supplement the energy he derives from food, by direct draughts from the fountain of force.

M. M., M. D., Iuka: Q. Why are so many of the so-called spirit communications commonplace?

A. If you should take a thousand people as they come, and have them write messages, would their communications be superior to those received from spirits? Yet those from the latter sources are not from an average, but usually inferior class. Engaged as they are, each in his or her own advancement, it is with greatest sacrifice that elevated spirits come to earth. They husband their time with care, improving every moment; and only when compelled by love of their erring brothers do they hold intercourse with man.

The lower circles make no such sacrifice. They retain strong affection for the places of their birth, and linger with regret and dissatisfaction. Ever near, they are ready to communicate at all times, and as the majority of communications are derived from this source, a ready and complete explanation is furnished of the superabundance of low and ridiculous communications.—Philosophy of Spirit, page 205.

I STAND UPON THE SUMMIT.

I stand upon the summit now
Of earthly life; the springtime's gone;
The early autumn with its flush of gold
Drops down upon me.
Frost has touched my brow,
And on my face
Time, his mark has lain.
But as to-night I read thy message sweet,
My soul drinks inspiration in each line.
My heart forgets its burdens,
And the light of hope and faith
Dispels each threatening gloom.
The autumn time seems as the joyous spring,
The cliffs whereon with mortal feet I stand
Kindle with ruddy glow
Love's magic wand,
My love has spread o'er every steep
A rosy warmth.
May heaven bless thy true and tender soul.
Wave on wave, its life has entered mine,
And I would be its lifelong friend and love,
Aye, I would be the bearer of the cup
That holds thy wine of joy,
To make thy life a richer one,
And ever strive to hide the world's rude harshness
Beneath the wealth of love.

GOLDEN THOUGHT.

As the sparks fly upward, so the mind of man tends toward the light.

SUBJECT: THE MESSIAH—THE CHRIST IDEA.

Note—Every statement is open for discussion, and a free expression of opinion. The moment any formulated thought enters the mind, without thorough questioning, and digestion, it becomes a dangerous precedent. The purpose is not so much to store the mind with ideas, as to set it actively to thinking, and to hold all conclusions tentative, against the time of better and fuller understanding.

For the older groups: The idea of an incarnate, divine mediator between God and man is of vast antiquity.

It grows out of the manner savage man views nature; as opposed to him, and hence evil. The course of reasoning of the savage, and continued to the present, is as follows: God must be perfect, hence man must have been created perfect.

Man is imperfect, hence must have fallen.

Between man's imperfection and God's perfection, man's finiteness and God's infiniteness, there must be a mediator.

As man by his fall has committed an infinite sin, only the infinite sacrifice can atone for it.

Hence the mediator must be infinite, incarnate, and as God is the only infinite being, must be God.

Jesus Christ was not the first expression of this idea.

There have been more than a score of conspicuous divine incarnations.

They have occurred among all races of men.

The Persian savior was called Mithras; the Cabalists called theirs Metraton; the Platonized Jews of Alexandria had the Logos, or the Word; the Hindu savior is Krisna; the Egyptian was Horus; the Greeks' Apollo, Hercules, Prometheus. One thousand and twenty-nine years before Christ, the Chinese Emperor, Mingti, was warned in a dream of the incarnation of Buddha Sakia, Confucius, by his character became as a Chinese Savior, as Zoroaster did to the Persians. The Aztec Savior was Quetzoalcoatl. All of these proved their divinity by being born of virgin mothers.

Their birthday falls on, or near the 25th of December.

Because that time marks the return of the sun from the South, or the resurrection of the new year.

The Christ idea is thus blended with solar worship and solar myths.

(Leaders by looking up the biographies of these Saviors in the cyclopedia, can have a large fund of interesting matter to introduce.)

Christ now stands for the highest ideal of moral and spiritual excellence.

For the younger groups: Washington, by his integrity, skill and self-devotion, was the savior of his country. Lincoln, by his honest devotion and upholding the right, was the savior of an enslaved race. (Introduce stories of these men and their biographies. Endeavor to draw out from the members whatever they may know about them.)

If your pet dog should fall into the stream and you should rescue it from drowning, you would be its savior. If you help one in need, you are a savior to the extent of your help. If your companions are rude, insolent, and do wrong, if you can by precept or example lead them right, as you awaken love for hate, and mercy for cruelty, you are saviors.

It is the most desirable of all things to be a savior. By assisting others to become good, loving and noble, you assist yourselves still more. In saving others you save yourselves.

Never go by a wrong or cruelty unnoticed. If you see anyone abusing or cruelly treating an animal, or a human being, it is your duty to interpose, not with anger, but with words of mercy.

You have secret enemies. They are selfishness, cruelty, thoughtlessness and many more. You must save yourself from these. How? Ask yourself if what you are going to do will inflict pain on others?—if you would wish it done to you?—will it make you happy or unhappy? Let conscience answer—you will be saved when love, charity, mercy and thoughtful consideration for others leave no place in your character for selfishness and cruelty.

MEMORY GEMS.

If the Divine Spirit can animate one man, it can all men.

If one man is divine, so are all men.

Jesus Christ idealizes the possibilities of everyone.

If man never fell, but is progressing from a barbarous state, he needs no mediator between him and God.

Sages, philosophers, scientists, by their achievements reveal to us our own capabilities; for as they are, so may we become.

Boundless capabilities, infinite progress are the birthright of the human spirit. It does not look without for its redeemer, but within.

Man, if redeemed, must redeem himself.

Sin cannot be forgiven, it must be outgrown.

The ultimate of the Christ idea is the divinity of man, and self-redemption.

If what are called miracles are effects of higher and unknown laws, then they are not miracles in any sense of the word.

Jesus is to be estimated by the truth he taught, like other men. His example is valueless unless a mortal like ourselves.

Far better for us to feel that Jesus is an elder brother than that he was an incarnation far removed from our sympathy.

The more ancient an idea the greater the probability that it is false.

The Christ child was a divine child—every child is divine, and as such capable of infinite perfection.

Every child is a son of God, as being an incarnation and individualization of the Infinite Spirit.

We should help others to the full extent of our ability.

We save ourselves by saving others.

Every man and woman should consider that they are individual sovereigns, to think and act for themselves, if they do not infringe on the rights of others.

There should be no conformity except to nature.

The thoughts of yesterday, if they cannot bear the light, should be cast aside.

Cease lopping off the branches, and strike at the roots of error.

Aim at no less than perfection.

The world worships at the shrine of unselfish action, and the real Bible of humanity would be a narrative of self-abnegation without a thought of self.

WE WANT TO DO MORE GOOD.

KANSAS TO THE FORE AGAIN.

As set forth by the Chicago Post, other State legislatures may have their occasional aberrations from the ordinary line of legislative subjects; they may repeal the laws of supply and demand, subvert the constitution of the United States and play seductive lays upon the tuneful sandbag of successful corporations and individuals, but when it comes to out-Heroding Herod commend us to the legislature of bleeding Kansas. Missouri recently started to make it a criminal offense for a young woman to decline a proposal of marriage, but this pales before the bill introduced by Representative Walters in the house at Topeka yesterday, to incorporate the decalogue in the statutes of Kansas and prescribe penalties for the infraction of the laws of Moses. The necessity for the enactment is thus set forth in the preamble to Mr. Walters' echo of Sinai:

Whereas, The men of the present generation have become doubters and scoffers;

Whereas, They have strayed from the religion of the fathers; and

Whereas, They no longer live in the fear of God; and

Whereas, Having no fear of punishment beyond the grave, they wantonly violate the law given to the world from Mount Sinai.

The text of the bill shows its contempt for monarchical institutions by rejecting the familiar phraseology of the King James version and placing the seal of Kansas scholarship and literary judgment upon the revised version. As the spirit if not the letter of the law is the same in both versions, there is no need to reprint the decalogue here. This is followed in the bill of Mr. Walters with the following schedule of penalties to be visited upon men transgressors only, the father of the bill explaining that "women are not ungodly and men are:"

For having another God, fine	$1,000
For making a graven image, one year in the penitentiary and a fine of	1,000 of	1,000
For taking the name of the Lord in vain and for not observing the Sabbath day, fine	500
For not honoring father or mother, six months in the penitentiary and a fine of	500

For committing murder, hanged by the neck until dead.

For adultery, penitentiary for life.

For stealing, fine or imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

For bearing false witness, imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

For coveting thy neighbor's house, his wife, his servant, his maid or his ass, fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

In any other state than Kansas this bill would be taken as a piece of red-hot irony, and would have been sent to some committee to sleep while its author slept off his drunk. But in the Kansas legislature it was received seriously and referred to the judiciary committee, which promises an early report, with no certainty that it will not become a law.

It is evident that Kansas does not intend to tolerate rivalry in the folly or fanaticism of its conduct of public affairs.

SPIRIT WARNING.

To the Millionaires and Multi-millionaires of the United States of America: Will you persist in accumulating vast hoards of wealth for your own selfish gratification, in the face of the fact that millions of your brothers and sisters (for we are all of one family) are suffering for want of the actual necessaries of life—not because of a famine, as is the case in India—but in a country where there is an abundance of everything to make life comfortable for all? Thousands of your brothers and sisters are at this time actually starving and freezing to death, men, women, and little children sending up piteous appeals to heaven for something to save them from perishing.

In response to these piteous appeals and heartrending cries, we who have passed on to the "spirit" side of life, the so-called heaven, who are unable to supply material help to the starving multitudes, much as we may desire to and because we sympathize with them in their terrible condition, do hereby warn you through this medium that you are causing your once prosperous nation to stand in the greatest danger.

Your country is on the verge of a revolution compared to which all previous revolutions in the world's history will appear insignificant indeed.

This will be brought about by a long-suffering people, after patience ceases to be a virtue with them.

It lies in your power to avert this terrible calamity which hangs like a dark cloud over this fair land. You must enter at once into an active and earnest effort to relieve distress, not as an act of charity but as a matter of duty you owe to the people.

You have accumulated wealth at the expense of the producers and you have left those who have produced the wealth in a condition wherein they cannot help themselves.

Beware! lest you deprive them longer of their God-given rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. They have the same rights upon this planet which you have.

Do your duty now, at this critical period; give the starving multitudes a chance to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, and you may possibly prevent your country from experiencing this greatest of all calamities. If you heed this warning now, you will do well; but if you do not, you will rue the day, and not only will you suffer in this life, but when you shake off the mortal coil and enter into the life beyond where we are living who give you this warning, you will be compelled to suffer the agonizing torments of a guilty conscience, and hear nothing but the wailing and moaning of the millions who have suffered starvation and cold through the unmerciful and inhuman money-grabbing institutions which fill the coffers of the few at the expense of the many. Dictated by the spirit of Horace Greeley through William E Bonney, Kansas City, Mo., Jan. 29th, 1897.

SENSIBLE TO THE LAST!

DOES NOT BELIEVE IN CANT, TAFFY, CRINGING, WHINING OR WHEEDLING.

To the Editor:—Each number of The Progressive Thinker has much that is interesting, and occasionally something that finds an instantly responsive chord in my being. This week it is Prof. A. B. Severance's "No Orthodoxy." I have been a firm believer in the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism for more than thirty years and all these years I have felt the inconsistency of Spiritualists conducting their exercises in the orthodox Christian manner. I hate cant and despise whining. Sometimes they call me cranky, for I have been so disgusted with the songs, and the "Will the dear spirits please come and communicate?" that I have left the seance knowing that under the circumstances I was not calculated to help make a harmonious condition.

I am confident that when I pass out of this old wornout body of mine, I shall want to come to the dear ones left on this side, and I certainly shall not come in answer to a call of "Nearer, My God, to Thee," nor a whining "Please, dear spirit." I shall expect just as much loving familiarity on the part of my family and friends after I have moved out, as I do now, and shall not put up with any other kind of reception.

"Prayers and invocations" are altogether too marked with the church bound. We do not believe in a God (Almighty). Then why pray to one? We believe our unseen friends are always ready and anxious to meet us and help us in every way they can; hence it is silly and must be disgusting to have us come pleading and whining for what they are waiting to give us. I often think when I see Spiritual lecturers posing in the prayerful attitude, if I was their control, I would shake that nonsense clear out of them.

No wonder our lectures can't be distinguished from those of the clergy. What better opening could an undeveloped Christian spirit ask than just that orthodox manifestation? What we want is sturdy, manly and womanly influences, those who are fearless and will hew to the line and let the chips fly where they may. We won't get that kind of influences while we come cringing and whining.

When we know a dear friend, or noted person whom we want to see and meet, is coming to us, we put on all the dignity we can muster, and meet them with open eyes and smiles, and tell them we are glad to welcome them; and use our very best endeavors to make things pleasant, and when they go we tell them we thank them for the visit and will be glad to have them come whenever they are pleased to do so. We don't fall on our knees and clasp our hands and raise our eyes heavenward and whine out: "Will the dear friends please come again?" Just think of treating our friends in this life in that manner! How many of them would come a second time? I think it would be a long time before I would venture to make a second call.

We do not need to flatter ourselves that our spirit friends do not appreciate us at our real worth; they probably know us better than we know ourselves, and all pretense and wheedling is not only thrown away and cannot help but degrade us in their estimation as well as our own.

Speakers who do the prayer-and-invocation acts tell us that the audience is harmonized in that manner. To my way of thinking, people who can be harmonized by such an act (I almost said, of idiocy) are not capable of appreciating the truths taught by our philosophy. When we ape the churches we do so at the expense of our integrity. The Christian prays to change the attitude of God toward themselves, or for fear he will change his attitude toward them. Spiritualists do not believe in a God of that kind. The "Great Ruler of the universe" is not a whimsical old priest who can be coaxed or wheedled by anybody. If there is a supreme ruler of the universe he is not subject to the desires nor demands of the mites and midgets he has placed here.

And as the idea is pretty generally understood that our spirit friends and the bands controlling our mediums and speakers know what are our needs, and what is for our best good, better than we can know for ourselves, the practice of trying to instruct them, or begging of them to do some special thing, must be not only humiliating but insulting. I believe in being natural, and meeting the friends who have passed "over the river" just as we did while they were with us; and as far as prayers and petitions are concerned, let us leave them to those who have an orthodox God to placate, an orthodox heaven to attain, and an orthodox hell to escape.

God is able to attend to his own business. Our spirit friends will be glad to see us be manly and womanly in the truest sense and as Abraham Davenport said: "Let God attend to his business, and let us attend to ours." Let us be consistent. ELVIRA L. ALLEN.

WORK OF PRESIDENT BARRETT.

To the Editor:—The Grand Mass Convention held by the N. S. A. in New Orleans during the week ending with Sunday, March 7th, will mark a bright epoch in the history of Spiritualism. The two daily sessions have been attended throughout by a throng of delighted people, and we feel that the labors of President Barrett and his able co-workers will reap in the Crescent City, as elsewhere, as abundant a harvest as zealous hearts could wish.

We wish there was some way made universally possible for the people of this country, wherever the truths of sweet Spiritualism have been spoken, to understand and appreciate even more fully the grand and conscientious labors being performed by President Barrett, of the N. S. A., for Spiritualism and humanity. None are so well able to comprehend the magnitude of the work he is, with his excellent co-workers, so nobly accomplishing, as they who travel through the different sections of the country, noting his work, as we do, in crossing his path; each place requires work peculiar to that locality, and no other; requiring work to fit the needs of each individual society—a personal endeavor which must needs tax his nervous system to the utmost, but which is building a monument of power and beauty which will speak in undying testification of the brave, untiring efforts of our leaders. Surely every true Spiritualist should come to the front with financial endeavors to place it within the power of this gifted worker for our cause, to with his able army of assistants, outwork the needs of the hour, among us as a people. The plain statement of the fact is that President Barrett has not gotten money sufficient to enable him to do the work for Spiritualism that it is necessary he should do, but how we can shame humanity into placing in his hands the means that should be raised for this noble purpose, I do not know.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means or developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

It deals with high official private life during the most momentous period in American History, and is a secret page from the life of him whom time serves only to make greater, more appreciated, and more understood—"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

Each one must digest their various kinds of food for themselves, and that is all they can possibly do whether they be priest or layman, teacher or pupil. My physical expands by virtue of that food and nourishment of which I individually partake and digest. My soul must expand by virtue of the soul essence which I individually gather and comprehend or digest."

ATLANTIS.
The Antediluvian World. Illustrated.

BY IGNATIUS DONNELLY.

THE QUESTION OF A ONCE-INHABITED but now submerged part of this globe known as Atlantis, is one of much interest. The data gathered from ancient and modern sources—from classical authors—from traditions, legends and mythologies; from the deep sea investigations of modern scientists and antiquarian researches in the mounds and the ruins of ancient cities found on the American continent—are here arranged in compact, literary form, in this very interesting volume. The book possesses especial interest to Spiritualists because of its affording corroborative evidence of the genuineness and truth of the statements purporting to be given by Spirits of ancient Atlantians concerning the fact of an Atlantis and a great people of the name, once existing on this earth. IMMORTALITY,
...OR...
FUTURE HOMES AND DWELLING PLACES.

BY DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

AN INVALUABLE WORK!

This admirable work contains what a hundred spirits, good and evil, say of their dwelling-places. Gives details—details and accurate delineations of life in the Spirit-world!—is the constant appeal of thoughtful minds. Death is approaching. Whither—oh, whither! Shall I know my friends beyond the tomb? Will they know me? What is their present condition, and what their occupations? In this volume the spirits, differing as they may, are allowed to speak for themselves. No man is better qualified than Dr. Peebles to place a work of this kind before the people. He treats of the Mysteries of Life; Doubts and Hopes; The Bridging of the River; Foregleams of the Future; Testimony of Saints; The Growth and Perfection of the Spiritual Body; Is it the Soul or Body that Sins?; Clothing in the Spirit-world; Our Little Ones in Heaven; The Personal Experiences of Aaron Knight; The Red Man's Testimony; Evil Spirits; Testimony of Physicians in Spirit-Life; The Homes of Apostles and Divines; The Friends and Shakers in Spirit-Life; Spirit Homes of Bruno and Others; Many Voices from the Spirit-Land. Many other matters are treated, too numerous to mention. Price $1.50; postage, 12 cents. For sale at this office.

Woman, Church and State.

A Historical Account of the Status of Woman Through the Christian Ages, with Reminiscences of the Matriarchate.

BY MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE.

THE AMOUNT OF VALUABLE INFORMATION succinctly and clearly stated in this volume of 554 pages is amazing. The title, as above given, fails to convey an idea of the fulness and completeness with which the subjects are treated. The Matriarchate, or Mother-rule, is the theme of the first chapter, in which much lore, quaint, queer and curious, is brought to view in elucidation of the subject. This is followed by chapters on Celibacy, Canon Law, Marquette, Witchcraft, Wives, Polygamy, Woman and Work, The Church of To-day, Past, Present, Future; and there is not a chapter in the book that is not handled in a masterly manner, and that for quantity and quality of information, is not worth the full price of the volume. It is packed with knowledge well-arranged, and intensely interesting from beginning to end. No one can possibly regret buying it; it is a valuable addition to the library of any free and truth-loving mind.

WONDERFUL WORK!

IT IS DONE BY THE CAMPBELL BROTHERS, IN BOSTON.

There was a large attendance occupying every available chair in the elegant parlors of the Campbell brothers in Boston, on the 13th of January, over sixty people being unable to obtain admission at the door on account of insufficient accommodation.

The seats at these seances have been in such great demand that they have all been bespoken weeks in advance. This is not an unusual experience, however, with these gentlemen, for in this city, also at Lily Dale, N. Y., which is their home, as well as in nearly every large city in the country, their seances have been fully filled, seats being frequently secured as much as five weeks in advance.

On the evening under consideration the ladies and gentlemen present were afforded every opportunity of satisfying themselves regarding every detail, after which Mr. Chas. Campbell made his customary remarks relating to the conditions necessary for the production of the phenomena. After a careful and rigid inspection of the slates, porcelains and papers had been made by the audience, they were placed upon a table in the center of the room, beneath a full light and within full view of every one present. It may be mentioned that throughout the entire evening, and during all manifestations, the Campbell Brothers work in a bright light. The cabinet was then minutely inspected, showing the utter impossibility of the entrance of any person, after which a committee of two was selected to sit with the medium, who joined hands, sitting on the outside of the cabinet the whole time, and being witin the view of every one. At this stage of the meeting Mr. A. Campbell was proceeding to place the typewriter in the cabinet, when it was discovered that the instrument was injured and would not work. Much to the disappointment of those in attendance, it was announced that it was utterly impossible to proceed, and the meeting was on the eye of dispersal, when one or two of the sitters present suggested, as an experiment, that the machine be placed within the cabinet to ascertain whether the forces would not readjust it. This idea was not received with much favor by Mr. Campbell, who regarded the test as entirely impossible of success, but giving way to the urgent appeals of those anxious to receive communications they had long anticipated with pleasure, the instrument was placed as indicated on a table within the cabinet, and the curtains drawn. Within a few moments the welcome sound of the ticking of the machine was heard, evidencing that the powers had lost no time in adjusting the damage, and operating the machine as usual. The paper was then passed to an invisible receiver together with a number of slates and porcelains. After the lapse of a few seconds a message was passed out, followed by numerous others to the number of about seventy, together with quite a number of beautifully painted slates and porcelains, executed in an artistic style in oil.

A well known doctor present received a portrait in oil and upon canvas of a loved friend, for which he had been waiting for years, and which was fully recognized by himself and many others as a perfect likeness.

A lady also received an exquisite etching of her beloved daughter. These beautiful souvenirs of spirit return were given to those to whom they belonged, as is a usual custom of these mediums. A novel feature of the evening was the table-lifting by those present in the audience, showing the development of the regular sitters at these seances. The announcement was made at the conclusion that the sittings would terminate on January 20th, the elder Mr. Campbell finding it necessary to recuperate in Florida, after the severe strain of so extended a series of seances. Mr. Chas. Alfred Campbell will, it is stated, take a tour through the west, during which he proposes to give a series of public exhibitions of his powers, that will enable those in remote centers to witness manifestations similar to those which have so delighted the residents of Boston and the vicinity.

CATHOLICS CENSURE THE PRESS.

To the Editor:—Ex-Priest Slattery continues to annoy the church, and apparently tells some unpleasant truths. But in all such attacks we should remember that "one story is good until another is told." If he belies the church, is there no redress but mob and persecution? Do not these weapons of defense indicate the weakness of the cause? Cannot the church meet the ex-priest on his own ground and, if he misrepresents, show him up? Is truth so weak that it requires criticism to be muzzled? Can they not trust free inquiry to settle the question, as we do in business and all other matters? These inquiries are suggested by a note in the Cleveland World, March 3, as follows: "Gregory Branch of the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association has adopted resolutions criticising the daily papers for printing advertisements and local items announcing that the ex-priest Slattery was to deliver lectures on 'Romanism,' 'the secrets of the confessional' etc." Here again comes up the same spirit that imprisoned Galileo, burned Bruno, and banished the Jews and Moors from Spain. True, it is only a criticism here; but what does it signify? Gag law. The church may criticise, censure, anathematize, persecute, and proclaim its supremacy, denounce heretics, consign all Protestants to eternal perdition, publish abusive travesties upon our public school system, and denounce secular education as abomination, moral corruption, and the work of the Devil; and no one denies them the right of opinion, and free expression. But when one of their priests comes out to tell the public something of the inside workings of the church, which they are at liberty to answer, and the secular press publishes all they have to say in defense of the church, these untouchable creedists are angry at the press for allowing the ex-priest to be noticed in their colums!

This is the old intolerance, mildly expressed. But had the church the same power it had in the days of Galileo and Bruno, does anyone believe that Slattery would be long out of a dungeon? It is to hold the liberty we have gained, and guard against the aggressive intolerance of the church, by keeping it out of the legislative and executive departments of government that the A. P. A's. claim to be watching and working; and as long as this old spirit continues to manifest in the church, dictating or trying to dictate, to a free people, what they may say, or publish, the A. P. A's. will be needed to check the political aggressions of the church. If the Catholics would be free participants in all the blessings of this free government, let them behave as law-abiding citizens, on equal terms with all other citizens and other religious bodies.

SPIRITUALISM IN CANTON, OHIO.

To the Editor:—Believing a little news from Canton, the home of Mr. McKinley, our newly made president, might be of interest to the many readers of your valuable paper, I beg permission to occupy a space in a column of The Progressive Thinker, and in that way make known to the many thousand progressive thinkers throughout the country the progress Spiritualism is making here.

We have since the first of the year added to our ranks Mr. and Mrs. Tiffany, formerly of Montpelier, Ind. Both Mr. and Mrs. Tiffany are hard workers in the cause of Spiritualism. Mrs. Tiffany is an excellent trumpet medium, and is doing a grand work here. Being an honest and kindhearted woman, no one seeking after truth and positive proof of immortality is ever turned away from her circles in case he or she has not the customary fee, and those who seek truth and knowledge in this lady's circles never go away disappointed in her as a lady and a medium.

I had the pleasure of attending a seance at her home, on Friday night, March 5th, that was grand. It is wonderful how strong our friends on the spirit side of life can come in this lady's seances. Little children as well as adults come and converse with their friends of earth for fully fifteen minutes, and at private sittings for fully a half hour, without once breaking the chain of conversation. I have had two private sittings with this lady, at which I conversed for fully an hour and a half each time with many of my arisen friends. Being honest and true herself, not a tinge of fraud ever manifests in her seances. Red Rose, her seance control, is a grand spirit and never fails at the beginning of each seance, to give satisfactory tests to each skeptic that may be sitting in her medium's circle. Those tests are so strong and strikingly true, that the skeptic's skepticism is at once checked, and his or her mind placed in the proper condition to receive arisen friends, and also the truth those friends are anxious to unfold to their friends of earth.

There are also a number of developing circles held weekly in different parts of town, by home people, and I have been told excellent results are being had, and many phases of mediumship are being developed.

We are sadly in need of a regularly organized society here. I do wish some good society organizer would drop in upon us. We have plenty of good material, but no one with the push and time to get the people together and organize a needed society. We also need lecturers, but being unorganized, we have no regular place to hold such meetings. The church people will go to hear a lecture—if free—while at the same time they would not be seen in a seance room. But by and by, after receiving the crumbs and a few of the spiritual truths from the rostrum, they become more desirous to experience the phenomena, and when that has been accomplished, they, unless too creed and hidebound, are ours, and in due time many of them join our ranks. We have in Canton, I am sorry to say, a number of so-called Spiritualists—people who know of the truth of spirit communion with their friends of earth, but are afraid to open their mouth publicly—afraid to openly advocate truth—afraid that by telling the truth they might be laughed at by the bigot, the ignoramus, the shallowbrained portion of humanity. The progressive and level-headed man or woman is ever seeking after truth and knowledge, no matter where it may be found, but the creed and hidebound mortals—poor souls, I pity them.

Remember dear friend, it will help you tenfold,
Those spiritual truths to ever unfold;
Every poor mortal you help to get light,
Adds one to our ranks to help win the fight.

A LIFELONG SPIRITUALIST.

The editor of The Progressive Thinker knows the writer of this letter personally and will bear testimony to his standing as a good Spiritualist. It is, then, needless for a certain class of readers to weaken the value of the following, by crying "skeptic." In the highest sense I do belong to that very necessary order—but I will not dwell upon this matter now.

A short time ago a very dear friend, knowing my almost complete ignorance of materialization—O yes, I have seen much that passes by that name—unfortunately too much for my own peace of mind (scientifically)—suggested my attending a certain seance, where I surely would not be disappointed. There was to be a thoroughly harmonious circle. No skeptics should mar the conditions; and the controlling intelligence did admit that nothing was wanting to permit of the best possible results.

Now there were remarkable manifestations that evening. I do not wish to describe them—it is not the time. But by way of digression, I must say this: In the years past, whenever (and it was in nearly every case) my suspicions were aroused, subsequent developments proved their correctness. I did not give voice to these suspicions—that were a dangerous thing to do. Freedom of thought, and exact observation, are by no means yet permitted, in the ranks of my fellow believers—alas!

Now as regards this particular seance, I will say that if everything was fair and above board, the results were wonderful. I do not say that there was collusion or sleight-of-hand, or trickery of any kind. I do not know—I can only say "not proven"—from the looks of things. And yet I may be wholly mistaken. Further, I want to be.

I am inspired to write the following: I will advertise a test circle (in its truest sense) through The Progressive Thinker. This will be made up of well known Spiritualists, vouched for by the editor. The seance to be held at one of these Spiritualists' homes. The medium will be treated with every courtesy and respect. An agreement will be signed that no grabbing nor any step will be taken to injure said medium. But the conditions will be so controlled that it will be practically impossible to simulate the real thing. Beautiful music will be furnished, and the conditions will be made as helpful and as sympathetic as truth-loving friends of our glorious movement can make them.

Further, if this offer be accepted by the medium, the records of the evening will be published under our names, whatever the results may be.

It will be seen that I do not even divulge the sex of the medium. It is because I do not want to do anyone any injustice—and I may be wrong. This letter will be sent to the right party who will recognize its meaning. If its honest intention be recognized and honored, a few words (unsigned) in the next issue of The Progressive Thinker will find me in readiness to respond.

A LIFELONG SPIRITUALIST, without a single test.

THE CAUSE IN COLORADO.

To the Editor:—Within the past month we have had quite an influx of mediums, and as a result much good work has been accomplished for the cause.

The inimitable and wonderful Slater is here from the Coast, and giving the manifestations that cause many to marvel, and some to recognize the great forces that are expressed through his organism. He has, of course, crowded houses, as he is always a favorite here, and draws many that go at no other time.

The Brockway family are here also from the far West, and are certainly earnest workers and pleasant people. We entertained them recently, and were much pleased with their personalities and quiet, unpretentious ways. I hear many speak in high terms of their mediumship, and know that they are well patronized.

Chas. Campbell, of the Campbell Brothers, so well known in the East, is here for a time, presenting unusual and beautiful manifestations of spirit power in paintings and written communication on porcelain. I am told they are en route for California.

The State Association has chartered two societies within the past month, and we hope during the coming season to accomplish good results.

Vice-president Mrs. M. A. Gridley, is doing a fine work here, and making many warm friends and patrons, as she is well fitted to do.

The work of the First Spiritual Church is marked by progress day after day, and the highly inspired teachings and marked phenomena given through my organism, as pastor of the church, meets the demand of many a hungry soul. This week we are to have a series of mass-meetings preparatory to the anniversary celebration.

The early part of April I go to Leadville for a few days to help the new society there, whose leader is that zealous worker, L. Agnes Moulton.

We are hoping to be able to hold a camp-meeting here the coming summer, and shall be glad of the co-operation of all workers coming this way. Starlight joins me in warm regards to all.

Denver, Col. G. C. B. EWELL.

WHAT WE WANT TO DO.

We desire to illuminate the minds of every Spiritualist. We will therefore send The Progressive Thinker to new subscribers for three months for fifteen cents, and hope by so doing to reach 1,000,000 of Spiritualists. For full particulars in reference to this remarkable offer read the communication headed "Fifteen Cents," on our fifth page.

DR. A. B. DOBSON'S

Healing powers are being repeated over and over again through the mediumship of MRS. DR. DOBSON-BARKER, who, for the past year and a half has

of all diseases that flesh is heir to, and will give you proof of her powers, by sending requirements as per small advertisement for diagnosis of your case. Here is one of her many cures:

St. Louis, June 21, 1896.

MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.

With affectionate regards, very truly,
REBECCA LEVY.

LAKE PLEASANT, MASS.

The winter meeting of the directors of the New England Spiritualists' Camp-Meeting Association was convened at the American House on Saturday, February 20th. In the forenoon a committee called upon the Fitchburg Railroad officials who are cordially co-operating in making Lake Pleasant the favorite resort of Spiritualists in the future, as it has been in the past.

Every effort is being made to have the coming season a most successful one. Mr. S. E. Ripley, of Turners' Falls, who in the past has given satisfaction to the campers as proprietor of the ice cream saloon, has taken the store and will make it an attractive place at which to trade.

Mr. Mayhew, of Millers' Falls, will have the barber shop; Mr. Hilliard will run the restaurant at the west gate on the Highlands; Mr. Ed Hunter will give the same satisfaction with the ice privilege as last year, and Mr. John H. Baldwin will have the hall and popcorn privilege. The Fitchburg Military Band and Russel's Orchestra which was such an attraction to music-lovers during the first twelve years of Lake Pleasant's existence, has been engaged for the coming season. Excellent vocal music will also be engaged. Mr. Conant, who had charge of the hotel last year, owing to ill health will not have the Lake Pleasant hotel for the season of 1897.

The Lake Side restaurant, hotel, and boat privileges, as well as the baggage privilege, will be granted to the most satisfactory bidder who sends a bid to the clerk before April 1. Three bids for the dancing pavilion have been secured, and will be considered at the same time as the others.

New water pipes are to be put in on the Highlands to accommodate the campers who built cottages last year. The grounds will be cleaned up and put in good condition by June 1.

All the speakers and mediums have been engaged. Colonel Ingersoll will lecture August 15, on the subject, "How to Reform Mankind;" and on August 22, on either "Why I became an Agnostic" or "The Truth." Circulars will be out by April 15.

PASSED TO SPIRIT-LIFE.

On the morning of March 2, 1897, from his home at DeSoto, Kansas, Major James B. Abbott passed to the higher realms, at the age of 78 years and 3 months. Major Abbott was one of the early pioneers of Kansas, coming to the territory in 1854. He was one of the leaders and champions of the Free State cause during the early struggles, settling on a claim a few miles south of Lawrence. Those were the days that tried men's souls in Kansas. Major Abbott always took an active part in all reform movements for the upbuilding of the material interest of the State. He was broad and liberal in his views, generous, kind, sincere and just in all his dealings with his fellowmen. No one ever came to him in distress and was turned away emptyhanded. He exemplified the beautiful teachings of Spiritualism in his every day life. Major Abbott was one of the pioneer Spiritualists of America. He was a Spiritualist before modern Spiritualism made its appearance in this country. He lived the life of a consistent Spiritualist, knowing that the better one lives in this life the greater will be their joy and happiness in the life beyond. Major Abbott lived to a good ripe old age, and it can be truly said of him that the world is better for his having lived. An aged wife and one daughter survive him. Mrs. Lull, inspirational medium and a personal friend of the deceased, delivered a very beautiful and comforting eulogy on the character and life of the deceased. O. G. RICHARDS.

Chas. Bradway, Sr., an old and highly respected citizen, living five miles north of Maquoketa, Iowa, passed to a higher unfoldment of life on Friday, March 5, 1897, at the age of 70 years, 8 months and 21 days.

He was a man of fine sensibilities, a good linguist, a thorough student and a believer in our beautiful philosophy. Intellectually bright, he was capable of discussing upon almost any subject, in a clear and comprehensive manner.

The funeral services were conducted by Mrs. J. M. Harvey, pastor of the Spiritual society, on Sunday afternoon, March 7. SEC'Y. S. S.

Departed this life, Friday, February 24, at the home of her sister, Mrs. E. A. Fuller, of Davenport, Iowa, our sister in the faith, Mrs. M. L. Kendall, in the 73d year of her mortal pilgrimage.

Our arisen sister has long been identified with us in our spiritual work at Clinton Campground, and has for many years tried to uphold the standard of her belief.

The funeral was conducted by an orthodox minister, as is the case in so many instances where the services of a Spiritualist speaker cannot be obtained. Not one word was said in reference to her belief, but instead it seemed to me that it was made the occasion to pour red-hot orthodoxy into our ears. It is sad to think that after a person has lived and died a Spiritualist, the last words said should be so unfitting her belief. Mrs. Kendall had many warm friends among the campers, as well as those outside, who will miss her presence in the coming years. MRS. B., A Spiritualist Sister.

"The Religion of the Future." By S. Weil. This is a work of far more than ordinary power and value, by a bold, untrammeled thinker. Spiritualists who love deep, clear thought, reverent for truth alone, will be pleased with it, and well repaid by its perusal. For sale at this office. Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

STUDY OF A CURIOUS INDIAN DRUG.

CURIOUS DRUG.

HASHEESH TO AID JUSTICE—DR. GATCHELL SAYS THAT CRIMINALS UNDER THE DRUG'S INFLUENCE CONFESS THEIR CRIME—IT PROMOTES SENSITIVENESS, AND EVEN MEDIUMSHIP, BUT THE EFFECTS ARE BAD.

In the realm of medicine there is no drug to which so much of romantic interest attaches as to the Indian hemp—hasheesh, says Dr. Gatchell in the New York World. It is the "nepenthe" of Homer, the potion given by Helen of Troy to Telemachus to make him forget all sorrow.

"Hasheesh" is made from a species of hemp native to India. Other names are "Chang" and "Gunjosh." In Arabia, Syria, Persia and other parts of the Orient it is smoked for the sake of its effects, as is opium by the Chinese or tobacco with us.

My study of hasheesh was prompted by a suggestion made by Dr. Le Bon, of Paris, that it might be made use of to extract a confession from one suspected of crime, a possibility that I have since experimentally demonstrated many times, for while under the influence of hasheesh the subject may often be made to part with the innermost secrets of his soul and to make admissions and confessions which while in his sober senses he would keep securely locked within his breast.

There were several characteristic effects of hasheesh that distinguished its action from that of other narcotic drugs. The most peculiar of these is the sense of dual being that it produces. While in its embrace one possesses a double consciousness. One "ego" stands calmly by taking observations while the other "ego" may be going through the most ridiculous and outlandish performances.

This sense of dual being is at the time accepted as nothing out of the ordinary, though it is afterwards recalled as being a most peculiar and remarkable experience.

EFFECTS OF HASHEESH.

Prominent also among the peculiar effects of hasheesh are the delusions regarding distance and the duration of time. Time is drawn out to interminable lengths. A minute seems a year and an hour an eternity. Distance likewise is immeasurable. To cross a room is equivalent to making a long journey, while in going a few blocks one seems to be weeks on the way.

There is one peculiar effect of the action of hasheesh that it closely allies it to that which exists in the hypnotic state, and to me this feature of the drug's action seems to be worthy of further study as serving to throw light on the phenomena of hypnotism. In some cases the hasheesh subject, like the hypnotic, may be made the abject creature of suggestion.

To any suggestion made by another there is prompt and ready response. Tell him that it is cold, he shivers and seeks the warmth; tell him that it is hot, and he throws off all impediments and pants with the heat that almost suffocates him, while the perspiration streams down his face. The prick of a pin, with a suggestion of pain, causes him to howl in agony. At the moment of most intense suffering a suggestion that there is no longer any pain, and it instantly ceases. And so, in infinite variety, the subject of hasheesh intoxication may be played upon like an automaton.

Thus it would appear that the hasheesh state in many of its features is a drug-induced hypnotism. In both states the will has parted company from the emotions and from the intellectual faculties.

To me the chief interest in the drug lies in the suggestion of using it in order to extract a confession from one suspected of crime. As already stated, I have several times experimentally demonstrated the possibility of such action. If it were not for the legal obstacles in the way of putting this into practice, I am confident that in some cases confessions could be extracted from suspected criminals which would lead to a revelation of facts that it would then be possible to corroborate by extrinsic evidence, and thus establish their guilt or innocence.

CHAS. GATCHELL, M. D.
Chicago, Ill.

A HASHEESH SEANCE.

In the drug hasheesh has recently come to light a most important property, the possibility of extracting criminal confessions from a subject under its influence. To what extent this startling action takes place, and just how far it may be depended upon in all cases, is still a matter of experiemnt. The Sunday World correspondent recently arranged an evening of tests under charge of Dr. Gatchell, the greatest authority on hasheesh in the United States.

The seance took place in a roomy bachelor appartment on the west side of Chicago one night last week. A dozen young medical students offered themselves for the experiment. They were divided into two groups, one selected to take the drug and the other to look after the smokers. There were a few moments spent in the preparation of chopped hay, grass seed and the black, sticky looking drug itself. Then the party proceeded to business.

Each of the five young men who were picked to try the effect of the hasheesh was first given a small bolus of the drug mixed to a sticky consistency with sugar. When he had swallowed this he was provided with a corncob pipe filled with chopped hay or tobacco and holding a button of hasheesh.

UNDER THE DRUG'S INFLUENCE.

Shortly after half-past 7 the first man had swallowed his portion and began pulling at his pipe. At half-past 8 his pulse had risen to 140 and he was beginning to report queer feelings in the back of his neck. Soon he was seized by a fit of uncontrollable laughter. At first the laugh was natural and enjoyable, but it grew more and more wild and strange until it became like the horrid merriment of a lunatic. After it came a delirium like drunkenness.

The young man danced wildly and sang, and made speeches of great imaginary force and oratorical effect, but which were absolutely flat in reality.

This youth was only fairly well launched into his performances when the second man began his laughing spell. He was a young surgeon, and he thought he had a joke on Dr. Gatchell. After about ten minutes' wild laughter and persuasion he finally blurted it out. It was that there was not "hair on the doctor's head." He also proved to be as susceptible as a hypnotized person. When told the room was cold he crowded up to the fire, put on his overcoat and showed every symptom of feeling chilled. At the suggestion of heat he threw off his outer clothing and wiped the perspiration from his face.

As the other hasheesh subjects began to succumb to the drug the fun waxed fast and furious. Part of the time four men were on the floor at once, screaming, shrieking and yelling and performing silly antics. At the height of the fun one young man stole up to the photographic apparatus of the Sunday World correspondent and secured two flashlight cartridges, which he dropped into the grate. Two reports which jarred the building and scared all the party except the author of the mischief followed.

The subjects' ideas of time, space and size became muddled and dulled.

After the yelling, riotous stage a stupor overcame the subjects. In it some were sick, some sleepy, and some saw beautiful visions. The effect of music seemed to be most extraordinarily strong, arousing or stilling them, making them glad or sad according to the tunes played. At the end the whole number who had taken the drug were in a quiet sleep.

It was in the suggestible state that the crime experiments were tried. A carefully kept secret was confessed to Dr. Gatchell by the young surgeon. He would not have done so in his waking state. Dr. Gatchell reported that if he had not known what he was trying to get he is certain he would not have been put in possession of the secret by the hasheesh devotee even after shrewd questioning.

A normal individual then took a pocketbook and asked the delirious young surgeon to keep it for him, stating that he had found it and offering to share the contents the next day. To all offers of a division of spoils the subject refused, but finally consented to keep the book in trust a few hours. Then he forgot all about the matter until a half an hour later, when another conscious person asked the surgeon to give him the pocketbook that he had seen a thief just give him.

This the young man refused to do, saying the purse had been given to him in trust. Then followed a long argument in which all joined, and which finally resulted in persuading the surgeon to give the pocketbook to Dr. Gatchell. Throughout this test the young man seemed to be strictly honest, though confused. Several similar trials were made with like negative results, though while they were going on another subject under the influence of hasheesh related aloud some choice bits of family history previously unknown to the party.

By twelve o'clock there was little left of the wildness that had characterized the earlier hours of the drug's action. The next morning none of the subjects felt exactly normal, but there were almost no evil effects.

THE BLIND MEN AND THE ELEPHANT.

It was six men of Indostan
To learning much inclined,
Who went to see the elephant
(Though all of them were blind),
That each by observation
Might satisfy his mind.

The first approached the elephant,
And happening to fall
Against his broad and sturdy side,
At once began to bawl:—
"Why, bless me! but the elephant
Is very like a wall!"

The second, feeling of his tusk,
Cried: "Ho! what have we here
So very round and smooth and sharp!
To me 'tis mighty clear
This wonder of an elephant
Is very like a spear!"

The third approached the animal,
And happening to take
The squirming trunk within his hands,
Thus boldy up and spake:—
"I see," quoth he, "the elephant
Is very like a snake!"

The fourth reached out his eager hand
And felt about the knee;
"What most this wondrous beast is like
Is mightly plain," quoth he;
"'Tis clear enough the elephant
Is very like a tree!"

The fifth who chanced to touch the ear,
Said: "E'en the blindest man
Can tell what this resembles most,— Deny the fact who can?
This marvel of an elephant
Is very like a fan!"

The sixth no sooner had begun
About the beast to grope,
Than seizing on the swinging tail
That fell within his scope,
"I see," quoth he, "the elephant
Is very like a rope."

And so these men of Indostan
Disputed hard and long,
Each in his own opinion
Exceeding stiff and strong,—
Though each was partly in the right
And all were in the wrong!

MORAL.

So, oft in theologic wars,
The disputants, I ween,
Rail on in utter ignorance
Of what each other mean,
And prate about an elephant
Not one of them has seen!

Do what good thou canst unknown; and be not vain of what ought rather to be felt than seen.—William Penn.

WHAT IT MEANS.

THAT RELIGIOUS AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

To the Editor:—I have been reading the views of several writers upon this most important question. It is agitating the mind of every thinker, and it is the duty of every thinker to make known the result of such agitation. Some very devout religionists sneer at the expression upon this subject, of certain "inferior" persons. I believe the time ought to be forever past when humanity is divided into "inferiors" and "superiors"—into "low caste" and "high caste."

The following are some of the reasons in favor of the amendment, as given in the International Cyclopedia:

1. "The nation must proceed from a power higher than itself. Having supreme jurisdiction over a portion of the earth, it acknowledges no superior unless it be God. As, therefore, it must be in subjection to the supreme governor, the fact ought to be acknowledged in the Constitution."

The nation proceeds from the intelligence of its people. When we ask from what source intelligence proceeds, we have reached an insoluble mystery. Then how can we acknowledge in the Constitution something which is an insoluble mystery? If the nation is already in subjection to the supreme governor, what additional benefit could be derived by simply acknowledging the fact in the Constitution?

The Constitution was not framed for the purpose of acknowledging facts, and much less for the purpose of solving the mystical problems of the Universe.

2. "The United States are a Christian nation. The first settlers acknowledged God, the Bible, and Christ. Christianity pervaded our institutions, is the preservative element and inspiring soul of the national life. It should, therefore, be recognized in the Constitution."

What does the writer mean when he says the United States are a Christian nation? There is no established religion, and not more than one-fourth of the population are members of any religious organization, including Catholics and Protestants. I think the statement is rather an inference.

When the writer speaks of the first settlers, I suppose he is relating to such as the New Haven Colony (1638) when only church-members could vote. Yes, Christianity pervades our institutions, especially in convents, nunneries and other denominational institutions.

3. "The present condition of the country requires it to be made. Large numbers of persons holding secular, infidel, and socialistic theories of government have made it their home, and are diffusing their sentiments; education is discussed more earnestly than ever before, and many are seeking to separate from it all religious principles and restraints."

Is not our country free? Where do those extreme religionists get their right to think as they please? Have not all citizens equal rights in our country? Then why prey upon the rights of some persons? Why not give to your fellowbeings all that you claim for yourself? Is our country a republic, or is it a theocracy? I do not think those religious enthusiasts can improve our Constitution, when it uses the immortal words: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

Is it possible that the writer spoke with enmity of education being "discussed more earnestly than ever before?" Every one knows that education is the act of acquiring knowledge; and knowledge is true happiness.

I believe our Christian friends ought to consult God before they go too far. If God has common sense and is a good-natured fellow, He doesn't want in the Constitution to aggravate a part of the people. And if He is an Infinite Being, there is not room in the Constitution for Him.

If there is a God, His place is in the entire Universe.

WHAT IT MEANS.

In general, it means more than any human mind can imagine.

Among other things, it means:

1. A going back to the old heathen customs, barbarism and ignorance.
2. Mental slavery.
3. Martyrs to the cause of truth.
4. Civil and religious war.
5. A dishonest scheme to gain church power, by the heathen idea of connecting church and state.
6. That honesty, intelligence, and free thought shall be a crime.
7. An attempt to suppress free institutions of learning.
8. That the church, and not the people of this nation, shall control it.

All truth is rational, and can be demonstrated. We do not hear mathematicians disputing over the result of mathematical problems. Chemists don't disagree about the composition of certain materials. Astronomers never wrangle over the time of a certain astronomical event—an eclipse, for instance. Why? Simply because the truth can be demonstrated.

Now, the church has been teaching, and preaching, and wrangling over its doctrines for two thousand years, and its members are still at variance with each other. They disagree on almost every topic of the great religious doctrines, and are constantly developing different denominations, each with a new creed—the present number is simply shocking. And now, when the church has made a miserable failure in establishing its truths, even among its own members, it is cowardly and insulting for it to sneak into Congress, and ask to establish its doctrine in our national Constitution.

Every person who suffered in helping to extinguish that "divine institution" thirty-six years ago, should be in favor of suppressing the same institution to-day.

The human race has had enough of the "Divine Right of Kings."

Let every American citizen form an opinion about this clerical scheme, and express that opinion. Yours for the truth.

Studies in Spiritual Thought

REUNION AFTER DEATH — FRIENDS WILL KNOW EACH OTHER THERE—HEAVENLY JOYS WILL BE AUGMENTED BY FRIENDS' COMPANIONSHIP.

The Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage is far from being known as a Spiritualist, yet the leaven of Spiritualism permeates some of his sermons, probably unconsciously to himself, and such was measurably the case on the occasion of a discourse delivered in the Westminster Presbyterian church at Minneapolis, Minn., January 24, on the subject of "Heavenly Recognition." Among other things he said:

Cicero, living before Christ's coming, said, "Oh, glorious day when I shall retire from this low and sordid scene to associate with the divine assemblage of departed spirits, and not only with the one I have just mentioned, but with my dear Cato, the best of sons and most faithful of men. If I seemed to bear his death with fortitude, it was by no means that I did not most sensibly feel the loss I had sustained. It was because I was supported by the consoling reflection that we could not long be separated."

GENERAL BELIEF.

"The Norwegian believes it. The Indian believes it. The Greenlander believes it. The Swiss believe it. The Turks believe it. Under every sky, by every river, in every zone, the theory is adopted; and so I say a principle universally implanted must be God-implanted, and hence a right belief. The argument is irresistible.

"I adopt this theory because there are features of the soul that will distinguish us forever. How do we know each other in this world? Is it merely by the color of the eye, or the length of the hair, or the facial proportions? Oh, no. It is by the disposition as well, by natural affinity, using the word in the very best sense and not in the bad sense.

"One more reason why I am disposed to accept this doctrine of future recognition is that so many in their last hour on earth have confirmed this theory. I speak not of persons who have been delirious in their last moment and knew not what they were about, but of persons who died in calmness and placidity, and who were not naturally superstitious. Often the glories of heaven have struck the dying pillow, and the departing man has said he saw and heard those who had gone away from him. How often it is in the dying moments parents see their departed children and children see their departed parents. I came down the banks of the Mohawk River. It was evening, and I wanted to go over the river, and so I waved my hat and shouted, and after awhile I saw some one waving on the opposite bank, and I heard him shout, and the boat came across, and I got in, and was transported. And so I suppose it will be in the evening of our life. We will come down to the river of death and give a signal to our friends on the other shore, and they will give a signal back to us, and the boat comes, and our departed kindred are the oarsmen, the fires of the setting day tinging the tops of the paddles.

HEARD THE ANGELS.

Oh, have you never sat by such a death-bed? In that hour you hear the departing soul cry, "Hark! look!" You harkened and you looked. A little child pining away because of the death of its mother, getting weaker and weaker every day, was taken into the room where hung the picture of her mother. She seemed to enjoy looking at it, and then she was taken away, and after awhile died. In the last moment that wan and wasted little face lighted up with glory of the next world, and cried out "Mother!" Do you tell me she did not see her mother? She did. So in my first settlement at Belleville a plain man said to me, "What do you think I heard last night? I was in the room where one of my neighbors was dying. He was a good man, and he said he heard the angels of God singing before the throne. I haven't much poetry about me, but I listened and I heard them, too." Said I, "I have no doubt of it." Why, we are to be taken up to heaven at last by ministering spirits. Who are they to be? Souls that went up from Madras or Antioch or Jerusalem? Oh, no! our glorified kindred are going to troop around us.

Heaven is not a stately, formal place, as I sometimes hear it described, a very frigidity of splendor, where people stand on cold formalities and go around about with heavy crowns of gold on their heads. No, that is not my idea of heaven. My idea of heaven is more like this: You are seated in the eveningtide by the fireplace, your whole family there or nearly all of them there. While you are seated talking and enjoying the evening hour, there is a knock at the door and the door opens, and there comes in a brother that has been long away. He has been absent, for years you have not seen him, and no sooner do you make up your mind that it is certainly he than you leap up, and the question is who shall give him the first embrace. That is my idea of heaven—a great home circle where they are waiting for us. Oh, will you not know your mother's voice there? She who always called you by your first name long after others had given you the formal "Mister?" You were never anything but James, or John, or George, or Thomas, or Mary, or Florence to her. Will you not know your child's voice? She of the bright eye and the ruddy cheek, and the quiet step, who came in from play and flung herself into your lap, a very shower of mirth and beauty? Why, the picture is graven in your soul. It cannot wear out. If that little one should stand on the other side of some heavenly hill and call to you, you would hear the voice above the burst of heaven's great orchestra. Know it! You could not help but know it.

IN THE DISTANCE.

Now I bring you this glorious consolation of future recognition. If you could get this theory into your heart it would lift a great many shadows that are stretched across it. When I was a lad I used to go out to the railroad track, and put my ear down on the track, and I could hear the express train rumbling miles away, and coming on; and to-day, my friends, if we only had faith enough we could put our ear down to the grave of our dead, and listen and hear in the distance the rumbling on of the chariots of resurrection victory.

O heaven! sweet heaven! You do not spell heaven as you used to spell it, h-e-a-v-e-n, heaven. But now when you want to spell that word you place side by side the faces of the loved ones who are gone, and in that irradiation of light and love, and beauty and joy, you spell it out as never before, in songs and hallelujahs. Oh, ye whose hearts are down under the sod of the cemetery. Oh, how much you will have to tell them when once you meet them.

How much you have been through since you saw them last. On the shining shore you will talk it all over. The heart-aches. The loneliness. The sleepless nights. The weeping until you had no more power to weep, because the heart was withered and dried up. Story of vacant chair, and empty cradle and little shoe only half worn out, never to be worn again, just the shape of the foot that once pressed it. And dreams when you thought that the departed had come back again, and the room seemed bright with their faces, and you started up to greet them, and in the effort the dream broke and you found yourself standing amid-room in the midnight—alone. Talking it all over, and then, hand in hand, walking up and down in the light. No sorrow, no tears, no death. Oh, heaven! beautiful heaven! Heaven where our friends are. Heaven where we expect to be. In the East they take a cage of birds and bring it to the tomb of the dead, and then they open the door of the cage, and the birds, flying out, sing. And I would to-day bring a cage of Christian consolations to the grave of your loved ones, and I would open the door and let them fill all the air with the music of their voices.

A JOYOUS MEETING

Oh, how they bound in, these spirits before the throne! Some shout with gladness. Some break forth into uncontrollable weeping for joy. Some stand speechless in their shock of delight. They sing. They quiver with excessive gladness. They gaze on the temples, on the palaces, on the waters, on each other. They weave their joy into garlands, they spring it into triumphal arches, they strike on timbrels, and then all the loved ones gather in a great circle around the throne of God—fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, sons, and daughters, lovers and friends, hand to hand around about the throne—the circle, hand to hand, joy to joy, jubilee, victory to victory, "until the day break and the shadows flee away."

There is truly a spiritual ring of buoyant life and transport in these utterances of the renowned Presbyterian divine—and it rings all the more in the tones of gladness born of the knowledge and prophecy of Spiritualism—without the dead, depressing undertone of Hell and endless damnation that is so important a factor in genuine orthodox theology, and without which it ceases to be orthodox.

And there is this sweet lesson in it to those who love spiritual thought: The deep, silent, all-pervading current of spiritual vibration, flowing from mind to mind—from heart to heart—from soul to soul—from the unseen and immortal majority of the great human family, into the minds and hearts of us of earth, is surely renewing the minds of men and women, laymen and titled divines, and is guiding and leading them, consciously or unawares, into the great liberty of the children of light. That spiritual light, entering the heart of one tied by orthodox creed—he forgets his creed, and, carried away by the tide of spiritual inspiration, delivers to his hearers the glad message from heaven, of spiritual thought, life and joy.

A FABLE—THE BLEATING LAMB.

Once upon a time there loved and lived together a Father and Mother Sheep, raising lambs, and as time went on apace there was born among other lambs a punny lamb, though it helped to gather provender both for the present and future needs of the family; and time went on apace, and the lambs grew up to full grow Sheep; and it was decided by the family of Sheep that there was not enough provender in store for the winter's keep of all the Sheep, so it was determined that the punny lamb, being weak, must go away, and not eat of that it had helped to gather. So this puny lamb went away—bleating—trying to find some food; sometimes it almost perished for the want of food and a home, as it went its way in the cold winter's snow; sometimes the dogs chased it and took away the food it had. Friendless and alone, it wished to die, having no mate, no near and dear friend, but the friendliness of the dear All-Father, who will not let his dear Sheep get too cold, or too hungry, but a deep, sweet, restful sleep will come; and the Angel-like-eye stars above, and the friendly feel of the downy snows beneath its feet, that felt almost warm—a bed in which peacefully and alone to die, the Angels only seeing and pitying, and ready to waft its tear-stained soul to the dear home of the dear All Father's Sheep, in whom is perfect perfectness, and perfect rest.

MORAL.

The foregoing fable is doubtless true of many poor, pitiable souls, (as it was in ours,) and for no fault of theirs, only the selfishness of others. So how charitable we all should be toward each other, not knowing how deep the snows have been.

ROWAN MILL TRAGEDY.

GREWSOME STORY OF A KENTUCKY MURDER AND ITS CONSEQUENCES—AN INNOCENT MAN LYNCHED BY A MOB, AND HIS GHOST LEADS THE REAL MURDERER TO HIS DEATH—THE UNHAPPY ENDING OF AN OLD-TIME ROMANCE.

Special Correspondence of the Globe-Democrat.

Several miles southwest of here, says the St. Louis Globe Democrat, near Bardstown, at the junction of the Springfield and Loretto turnpikes, is a grewsome spot, given a wide berth by the superstitious, as the ghosts that are alleged to yet lurk there recall vividly a revolting crime of the long ago, which had its parallel only in the now famous Pearl Bryan murder, that Jackson and Walling are soon to suffer for. It is a steep hill, probably a quarter of a mile in length by 50 yards in width, known as "Pottershop Hill." Composed chiefly of yellow clay, it is a dreary and desolate looking place. The hill is bounded on the north and east by pikes above mentioned, and on the west by Rowan's Creek, a good-sized stream, which, in the early days of the century, furnished power for a fulling mill owned by Judge Rowan, in ante-bellum days a United States Senator, and noted as a lawyer and statesman. At the top of the hill, and extending far to the southward, is a dense growth of cedars.

In the early days of the present century there stood at the foot of the Pottershop Hill a large weatherboarded log house, which was occupied by Walter Hays and family. Hays operated a blacksmith shop and, as the old state road ran in a few yards of the place, he did a lucrative business. Years afterwards the old house was purchased by one Joseph Price and converted into a pottershop, for which purpose it was used until the outbreak of the civil war, when it was torn down to prevent the federal authorites from using it as a small-pox hospital for soldiers as they had planned to do. The stone foundation and a few moldering logs are all that remain of the old building. After the house fell into Price's possession, grewsome stories became current among the negro laborers and the whites in the neighborhood of a headless woman who would nightly emerge from the cedar thicket at the top of the hil and carefully make her way along the cliffs that bordered the creek to the corner of the old pottershop, where she would, after pausing a moment, disappear entirely from view. Price's negro laborers were nearly frightened to death by the uncanny apparition, and it was with difficulty that he compelled them to work in the shop after night. These negroes knew of the horrible murder that had been committed there, and it required but little imagination to make a ghost stalk abroad at midnight's hour. The story of the crime was well known to the generation that has all but passed away, and in this way it has been handed down to this period.

Nancy Hays, the only daughter of Walter Hays, was a beautiful girl; slender and graceful, with a delicate wild-rose complexion and violet eyes. As was natural, she had many suitors for her hand, but the favored one was Amos Molloy, the foreman of Judge Rowan's mill. Noah Matheney, also employed in the mill, was deeply in love with Nancy, but his attentions were obnoxious to her, and she had on more than one occasion given him so to understand. One day Nancy Hays came to the mill and engaged in a longconversation with young Molloy, the favored one during which a little lover's quarrel arose. He was seen to gesture angrily, and several bystanders heard him to say to the girl:

"Very well, then; you will be sorry for this. Mark well what I say."

Thus they parted. This was in the morning. At dusk that evening a number of people saw Amos and Nancy together, walking toward the strip of forest that bordered the creek near the mill. At 10 o'clock that night an old farmer living a short in the country dashed into Bardstown with the intelligence that a young girl had been murdered on the cliffs near Rowan's mill. An excited crowd surged to the place indicated, and, near the edge of a high cliff, overlooking the stream of water, the dead body of Nancy Hays was found, dreadfully hacked and bruised, and her head severed from her shoulders. A terrible hush fell upon the crowd as they gazed upon the spectacle. The silence was broken by Noah Matheney (Molloy's rival), who stepped to the side of the dead girl, and lifted a bloody handkerchief from the ground. "Perhaps this may give us a clew," he said; and holding the linen where the light of the moon could fall upon it he scanned it closely for some name or initial. Suddenly his face brightened, and holding the handkerchief high in the air he exclaimed: "I find in one corner of this handkerchief—which is a gentleman's—two letters, A. M.'." Then pausing and glancing around he added, with great significance: "Where is Amos Molloy?"

"Yes; where is Amos Molloy?" the crowd repeated, and every eye searched every face; but they found not what they sought. Molloy was not there. Then some remembered his angry words to Nancy Hays that morning; others of seeing them afterward together, going in the direction of the wood. A shout of rage rent the air, and loud were the curses heaped upon the absent man.

While this scene was being enacted a blood-stained and apparently half-stunned man staggered into the open porch of a farm house a mile away, and, rousing the inmates, asked to be allowed to rest. This was Amos Molloy, and here he was found a short time afterward by a body of angry men. He was taken to where the gory corpse of Nancy Hays was lying. Throwing himself upon the body he raved like a man bereft of his mind. It was with difficulty that he was torn away and dragged under the branches of a huge oak tree. Here a rope was thrown over an outstretching limb, and a noose adjusted to the man's neck. He was then given a few minutes in which to explain his terrible conduct. In the shadow of death, and without a tremor in his voice, the doomed man told his story. He said that he and Nancy were engaged to be married; that they had quarreled because she had wished to attend a dance in a neighboring county against his will; that they had made it up a short time afterward; that he meant nothing by the threat. In the evening they walked toward the wood; when near a bluff on the roadside a masked man leaped from the bushes and assaulted Nancy, hacking her with an ax. In endeavoring to defend her he was himself struck several times, and then hurled from the bluff. He was rendered unconscious by the blows and the fall, and must have lain for some time. In a half unconscious state he had wandered to the farm house where he was found. Of course, no one believed his story, and willing hands seized the rope, and Molloy was hung until life was extinct. This was the first lynching that ever occurred in Nelson.

Years passed away. Noah Matheney went to the West, and was never heard from. Walter Hayes, the heart-broken father, moved to the "Yellow Banks," now Owensboro, Ky., where he died, and the remainder of his family was scattered far and wide.

One stormy night in the spring of 1830, a horseman galloped up to the minister's door and bade him hurry to the office of Dr. Harrison; a man had been thrown from his horse, and lay dying there, and had requested the presence of a preacher. What happened afterward is taken almost verbatim from the old clegyman's diary:

"I found the man stretched upon a mattress on the floor of the doctor's office. The physician was bending over him, and upon my entrance informed him that the minister had arrived. I knelt by the man's side and took his clammy hand in mine. His face was bruised and mangled in a dreadful manner. There was nothing about him that I recognized. He was an entire stranger to me. 'My man,' I said, 'what can I do for you?' 'I am dying,' he said, 'and I want to make a confession to you. Do you think that will help me any in the other world?' I made him an appropriate answer and urged him to talk. He then narrated what is put down here, speaking rapidly for one in his condition:

"'Years ago there was a murder—an awful murder—committed out yonder on the cliffs by Rowan's mill. The victim was Nancy Hayes. She had two lovers—Amos Molloy and Noah Matheney. She loved Molloy, but did not even like Matheney. He knew it, for she had told him so a few days before her death, when he had asked her to marry him. He was jealous of Molloy and longed for revenge. His time came much sooner than he expected. Molloy and Nancy quarreled at the mill one morning. That evening they went walking together. Matheney masked himself and followed them. They were a good distance ahead of him, and darkness was fast coming on. Secreting himself in some bushes by the roadside he waited for them to return. When they did so, Matheney assaulted Nancy with an ax, hacking her to death. Molloy, taken by surprise, could do nothing, and he was hurled from the cliff.'

"Here the dying man paused and gasped for breath. The storm without still raged; the rain beat violently against the windowpanes; the wind would tear around the house in fitful gusts and die away among the distant hills, with a moan that was almost human, and more than one shudder convulsed my frame as I listened to the dying man's dread recital. Finally, he continued:

"'It was easy for Matheney to steal back in time to take an active part in the search for the murderer. Molloy was at once suspected, and through Matheney's maneuvering he was arrested and hanged. After this Matheney went West; and, after years of torturing remorse, something compelled him to return to his native town. Minister, do you believe the dead are ever allowed to return to this world? No? Well, I do.'

"Another pause, and then—'In returning to this town Matheney's road led him by the place where the murder had been committed. He willingly would have avoided it, but he could not. The same incentive that caused him to return here also compelled him to pass that fatal spot. To-night when the storm was at its height, he was on that spot. Oh, how it did rain! How the thunder crashed, and how the wind roared! It would have been dark, too, but for the incessant flashing of lightning! Matheney's heart was frozen with terror, and stood trembling in every limb. There was a great blaze of lightning, and from out the bushes—the same bushes from whence Matheney had stepped with his murderous ax years before—came Amos Molloy. Yes, Amos Molloy, for the lightning trembled and played about him, and he was as plainly visible as he was that night when he was dragged under the tree to die the death of a felon. How white and determined his face looked, as he stretched forth a shadowy hand and grasped the bridle on Matheney's horse and led him to the very edge of the cliff. Matheney was paralyzed with terror and could make no resistance. The lightning still blazed, and the phantom, turning back a white, revengeful face, led the horse with his rider over the bluff and they were dashed far down into the darkness below.' Again the dying man paused and lay almost motionless. Suddenly—'Minister,' and he almost shrieked, 'I am Noah Matheney and I killed Nancy Hays! See! See! There she is now!" Raising himself half way up, he cried again in piteous voice. 'God have mercy on me,' and fell back upon the mattress dead."

A half mile south of the old pottershop is a shelving cliff, which rises to a considerable height above Rowan's Creek. The surroundings are bare and Scintillations From Australia.

DR. J. M. PEEBLES IS ON A TOUR AROUND THE WORLD AND LECTURED JAN. 17, TO AN IMMENSE AUDIENCE AT MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA—HE TOOK FOR HIS SUBJECT, "SPIRITUALISM, ITS USES AND ABUSES."

A large audience filling every seat in the above large hall assembled to hear Dr. Peebles' first public lecture on Spiritualism in connection with his third advent amongst us. A number of those who had attended his previous lectures nearly twenty years since were present, and general surprise was expressed at the slight change time had made in his appearance, whilst his intellect was as clear and vigorous as ever.

The doctor said in substance: A quarter of a century has rolled away into the past since I first saw Australia, and nineteen years since my feet pressed your soil the second time—and and I can only exclaim what marvelous changes! Your buildings have grown taller, your suburban pasture-lands of those bygone years are now dotted with beautiful homes, half buried in ornamental shrubbery, and your trams make music along the streets; progress, prosperity, evolution, everywhere.

But what personally affords me the greatest satisfaction is those friendly and familiar faces before me, and hands just as warm as when they first grasped mine in the long ago. Surely unselfish friendships are eternal. And then, this large capacious hall so literally packed to-night, reminds me of those audiences of 2,000 and more that used to crowd the theatres when on my first pilgrimage to your city, and thence onward around the world.

During my travels in nearly all lands and nearly all skies, I have investigated the religions of the different nations, races and tribes; and as yet, I have never met race or tribe however low in the moral scale that did not have some conceptions of God, or gods, and some ideas, however crude of a future conscious existence. These ideas are God-implanted. They are innate. They spring up in the human soul spontaneous. And further, in these world-wide pilgrimages, I have met Brahminism, Zoroastrianism, Buddhism, Jainism, Shintooism, Mohammedanism, Roman Catholicism, Lutheranism, Calvinism, Jesuitism, Presbyterianism, Congregationalism, Materialism, Methodism, Universalism, Mormonism, and other isms still; but, reduced to the last analysis there is only one ism that goes straight to the foundation of things—that satisfies the profound thinker, that demonstrates a future conscious existence, that inspires all reformatory movements and scatters the roses of peace, charity, love and good will to man along the pathway of life, and that is Spiritualism. And it is so, because divinely rooted in and riveted to God, Who is the Spirit of all spirits. Accordingly, Spiritualism in some form, and under some name is the oldest truth in the universe—the oldest religion of remotest antiquity.

Emerson sought to define God by pronouncing Him the Infinite Oversoul; Arnold as the Power that made for righteousness; Pythagoras as the Universal Life Essence; Paul as the All and in All; Proclus as Causation; and Jesus, summing these ideas all up and putting them into a single world said—"God is Spirit"—And human beings, of whatever color or clime, being made in the image of God are naturally and necessarily spiritual beings. And just as music responds to music, thought to thought, and mind to mind, so spirit responds to spirit in all worlds whether visible or invisible; hence the naturalness of spiritual communications.

Our communications with each other are spirit communications. The spirit is the real man. The body is the shell, the tent, the tabernacle that he tarries in for a season. It is neither correct nor logical to say, "man has an immortal spirit." But rather say, man it a spirit—a spirit now, a natural finite spirit, spirit vestured in mortality and capable of almost infinite possibilities. Death is but a little eddy in the overflowing stream of life—a friendly hand, that opening the icy door, guides us across the crystal river to the homes of the blest. It is the golden key that unlocking the entrance chamber to the soul lets the flesh-enchained prisoner out and up into the fairer fields of immortality. Death in its time and turn is beautiful; ever remembering however, that our good deeds here, our generous self-sacrificing lives construct our future paradises, beautify our lawns, make the winds more musical, the far away stars more visible, and our immortal clothing more bright and golden. God is good, and his angels are our guardians.

The Brahminical and Buddhistic sacred books, like our Bible, abound in the history of spiritual manifestations. Zoroaster and Socrates were spiritual mediums. Thales, Zeno, Epimenides, Cicero, with other of the Philosophers, and most brilliant orators of ancient Greece and Rome were Spiritualists. Jesus standing upon the very pinnacle of Hebrew Spiritualism, conversed with Moses and Elias; and he chose his apostles not because they were scholars or learned Rabbi's, but because they were sensitives having mediumistic gifts. The early Christian fathers had visions, the gift of tongues, and like the disciples of Jesus fall into trances. Swedenborg for twenty-seven years held open communion with spirits and angels. George Fox, the Quaker, and the Wesleys were mediums. The Shakers of America were Spiritualists from the first. The Fox sisters near Rochester, N. Y., neither invented nor created the "rappings." They simply discovered them. They interpreted the language of those delicate telegraphic tickings from the other side of the great divide. Otherwise, being by organization psychic sensitives they re-discovered one of the lost methods of conversing with the dwellers in eternity.

Spiritism, as Alfred R. Wallace wisely said, "is quite as well proven as are the facts in any of the other sciences." That spirits in the body can converse with spirits out of the mortal body is now an absolutely demonstrated fact, and the fact is God's living witness of a future existence. But Spiritualism, while accepting the phenomena and encouraging them, mounts one step higher into the moral and spiritual realm, manifesting—manifesting in daily life the "fruit of the spirit"—which the apostles described as "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, patience, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance"—all, moral and spiritual qualities of the soul. Consider, remember that Spiritualism is a divine truth, that neither Popes, priests, bigots nor ignoramuses can destroy. Its allies are investigation, research, freethought, free speech and a free press. Every enlightened country to-day has its mediums, seances, lecturers, weekly journals, monthlies, and quarterlies; and it is honey-combing the churches with the gospel of the living Christ, and angel ministries.

Though Spiritualists acknowledge no one infallible leader; though they have no fixed confession of faith; though they are chained to no church-encrusted creed; they generally teach the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, the present ministry of spirits, the certainty of punishment, the progress of humanity, and the "One far-off divine event

To which the whole creation moves."

Omitting the doctor's experience in entrancing young Atkins and transferring his own thoughts to the subject's brain, willing him to speak them, his relations of a wonderful Masonic test through a lad of sixteen, entranced, his reference to an old vegetarian Quaker, who had already "lived in heaven fifty years," and other interesting illustrations, he continued:

Spirits are only men and women divested of their earthly bodies. They have taken with them consciousness, memory, reason, sympathy, character. They walk by our sides often, and yet unseen. Some are angelic, others deceptive, selfish and evil-minded. Here comes in one of the abuses of Spiritualism. No matter what name is signed to the spirit communication—exercise your own reason, rely upon your own calm judgment, "try the spirits!" Another abuse is these promiscuous seances in ill-ventilated rooms, and still another is the calling upon spirits to locate gold mines, trace criminals, find Captain Kidds's buried treasures and forecast matrimonial adventures—all of which are worldly, selfish, unspiritual and utterly unworthy the candid seeker after heavenly truths and teachings. It is the frivolous and vicious conduct of this kind that opens the door to the denizens, the earth-bound denizens of the lower spheres, resulting in obsessions and deceiving communications. It is unwise to trifle with Spiritualism, hypnotism or any of the finer invisible forces surrounding us.

While there are thousands and tens of thousands of trustworthy royal-souled mediums—message-bearers bringing tidings from our loved ones in the higher spheres—there are, sad to say, pretenders, impostors, and traveling frauds who leave an unsavory slime in their crooked winding tracks. I am speaking especially of America where in many cities and lesser localities Spiritualism is decidedly popular. These impostors are promptly exposed and generally, as it should be, by Spiritualists themselves. It was well that Judas went to his own place. The abuse however, implies the use; the wrong implies the right; and the false implies the true; just as the counterfeit coins indicate the genuine.

Spiritualism as aforesaid is of God, and has come in the culture and very blaze of this nineteenth century to stay. In the year 2,000, or before, embracing and encompassing the good of all phenomena, the good of all sciences, and of all philosophies, Spiritualism will be the acknowledged religion of the world. Already it has inspired the grandest reforms of the age, such as the emancipation of 4,000,000 of slaves by President Lincoln, the comparative freedom of millions of Russian serfs by Alexander the Second, and the construction of the magnificent University in America by Senator Stanford.

It has further given us a new geography of the heavens and the hells, assuring us that mortals enter the future world with as absolutely substantial bodies as we have here, only more refined and etherealized. That there are different degrees of happiness there. That memory is the undying worm. That there is intense mental suffering in those dark Cimmerian spheres. And yet God builds no hells; He burns no man's fingers here, damns no souls there. Men are the architects of their own hells; they reap what they sow. Every child born into this world is a possible archangel or a possible demon; his head touches the world of light, his feet the world of darkness. Man is a rational moral being, having the power of choice. Suffering follows sin; there is no escape. Divine punishment is disciplinary in all worlds. Jesus the living Christ still preaches to undeveloped, imprisoned spirits. The angels call, and souls are constantly coming up through tribulation deep. The door of mercy is not shut; there is ever the opportunity of progress from darkness to light. God is love. And heaven's rest is not idleness: The soul's activities are intensified by the transition. The future life is a social life, a progressive life, a heavenly life of growth, of love, and of truth. Involutions and evolutions are universal laws spinning all ages and all worlds. The future is afire with hope and aflame with progress.

All thinking, reading and really intelligent persons know that there are now over 25,000,000 of people in England and her colonies, in America and other enlightened countries, noted for their intelligence, conspicuous for their honesty, famous for their scientific attainments, distinguished for their good moral character, and scholarly adeptship in psychic research, who solemnly testify that on scientific principles they have critically investigated and demonstrated the fact of a future life through spirit manifestations. Their testimony is as direct and overwhelming as it is unimpeachable! And Spiritualism—this gospel of life, light and truth—is sustained by the higher intuitions of all races. It is in harmony with the great law of evolution; it is in agreement with pure reason; it is in accordance with the heart's sweetest hopes; and in consonance with the soul's divinest aspirations. It is found in the inspired teachings of all sacred books. It is God's living witness of a future conscious existence and those who war against it, war against God and immortality. Oh! that Atheists and Agnostics could be induced to drink from this ever-flowing fountain of spiritual truth, and that Sectarians could be induced to renounce such "seducing spirits" as fashion, pride and worldliness; and such "doctrines of devils" (using Paul's language) as "total depravity," the "fall of man in Adam," "election and reprobation," and "endless hell torments." These "doctrines of devils," mentioned by Paul; or, when rightly translated, these devilish doctrines, have been so fruitful of Agnosticism and scoffing Atheism that the true Spiritualist feels to exclaim with the old Hebrew prophet: "Oh, priests, ye have been a snare on Mizpah."

Spiritualism is most opposed by Roman Catholic Popes, Protestant priestcraft and vulgar prejudice. It is unpopular only in dens of ignorance, in institutions for weak-minded, in lunatic asylums, State penitentiaries and sectarian creed-cursed churches. It is popular with thinkers, artists, poets, scholars, authors, and the world's literati. It is the only religion of Heaven.

SPIRIT MUSIC

CHARMING MELODY SAID TO HAVE BEEN COMPOSED IN THE WORLD OF SHADES—HEARD AT A SEANCE—NOTES AS ARRANGED BY THE DEAD MUSICIAN TRANSMITTED THROUGH AN INTELLIGENT TABLE.

It is quite common for spirits of famous personages to hold conversations with their living relatives, or even with admiring strangers, but until a few days ago there was not, I believe, any case on record of a deceased musician composing a melody in the under world and sending it as a gift to living lovers of music. Yet this amazing feat, we are told on excellent authority, has just been performed by the distinguished musician Offenbach, who, as all the world knows, passed away from life some years ago. M. I. Camille Chaigneau, manager of the review entitled "L'Humanite Integrale," tells the story.

"M. I. R., a professor of music in Germany and a nephew of Offenbach," he says, "was introduced to me last month. He desired, while studying in Paris, to study the phenomena of spirits through the aid of mediums. I expressed my regret at not being able to introduce him at that moment to any of the valuable intermediaries between the inhabitants of space and the inhabitants of earth. However, I suggested that he and I should try a little experiment ourselves by placing our hands on a little three legged table, for I thought that perhaps we might be able to enter into conversation with some invisible friend. And very soon a spirit whom we both knew began to converse with us, and suddenly he said:—'Your uncle Offenbach is here.' Then followed an affecting conversation between uncle and nephew.

A STRANGE CONVERSATION.

"'My dear uncle,' said my companion, are you still fond of music? What are you doing now? Do you still play the violoncello?'

"'I play the instruction (sic) which produces harmony,' was the reply.

"Of course, all this conversation took place through blows which were struck by one of the legs of the table, and in accordance with the usual alphabet—one blow for a, two for b, three for c, four for d, and so on, and, futhermore, one blow for yes, two for no, and three for a very emphatic yes.

"'Could you compose a melody for us which would be really your own work?' asked the nephew.

"'Yes, yes,' was the prompt reply.

"'Sharps or flats? Major or minor key?'

"'Four sharps. Major key.'

"Straightway the notes (or rather the letters, according to the German style of notation) were dictated promptly and without the slightest hesitation, no corrections being made. We had our hands on the table, and M. R. called out the notes, one after the other, in German, and the table notified him when he should stop. Sixteen notes were obtained in this way and in the following order:—

"H, a, c (is), e, h, g (is), a, f, (is), g (is), e, a, h, a, e, g (is).

"The German note 'c' corresponds to our do, d to re, e to mi, f to la, g to sol, a to la and h to si. The termination 'is' indicates sharps.

"As soon as the notes had been taken down M. R. asked:

"'What is the time?'

"'Six-eight,' was the reply.

"The table, which had all along been animated by some interior force, drew us toward the piano, and M. R. with the assistance of his uncle, turned the notes into a very pretty little melody. While doing so he kept one hand on the table in order to question Offenbach, and with the other he wrote down the notes. Strange to say, the table kept moving meanwhile in perfect harmony with the melody. Then the nephew said:

"'This melody deserves a title. Will you give us one?'

"'Call it "An Air from Beyond the Tomb,"' was the reply.

"'Words ought to be fitted to it,' I added.

"'Search among the poems gathered by the medium Marie d'A. for the verses which will best suit the melody,' was the advice given to us.

"We searched and soon found suitable verses. They occur in a poem written by a spirit and are a panegyric of memory, since it enables spirits to sing and love.

RECOGNIZED AS GENUINE.

"M. R. hastened to show 'The Air from Beyond the Tomb' to one of Offenbach's daughters, and though she is not a Spiritualist, she recognized it as her father's composition. M. R. is himself a composer and had written an appropriate accompaniment to the piece. Encouraged by his success, he tried to get a second melody from Offenbach, and at first it looked as though he would succeed. The table moved briskly and indicated a goodly number of notes. But great was the disappointment of M. R. when he took his seat at the piano and began to play, for nothing was heard but a frightful babel of sounds, in which there was not the slightest trace of a melody. The notes tumbled over each other pell mell, utterly regardless of time or harmony.

"To account for such an ignominious failure is impossible. My private opinion is that this lesson was given to us as a proof that the inhabitants of the other world are not always willing to comply with our wishes. Often, too, their fluids are wasted or exhausted after their tasks are done, and they are compelled to retire, in which case mocking spirits take their places.

"In the present instance one good result has certainly been obtained, for surely here we have an excellent proof that no such phenomenon as this, which has given us a pretty melody, can be attributed to transmission of thought, or what Aksakoff calls 'animism.'"

Put Vim Into Your Religious Life

A CONCERTED ATTACK.

GENERAL ATTACK ON SPIRITUALISM—IT IS RAGING ALL ALONG THE LINE—MUST BE MET WITH ENERGY AND COURAGE.

For several weeks every Spiritualist paper and some secular papers as well, have told us that a movement was on foot to deprive Spiritualists of their rights under the religious laws of the land. First it was in one section of the country, then in another, and finally it has covered the entire length and breadth of the land.

This week's Progressive Thinker opens with the same story. What does it mean?

From the east, west, north and south agitation to impose laws on the people that will keep a portion of them from exercising their religious rights. Here in Massachusetts the doctors are trying to "freeze out" the healers. In Michigan a similar movement, only striking harder. Now, in Chicago, a movement to stop all such "nonsense."

Why is this? What has caused this tremendous onslaught? Is there a reason for it? I believe there is. Let us examine the situation.

For centuries past the one man who ruled with rod of iron was the priest. The one to whom was referred questions of law and equity, regardless of the regularly appointed officers, was the priest. If a man traded horses, he asked the parson's advice. If he wanted to get married, he went to the parson.

In each of these cases the "man of God" had an infallible guide to settle all points. Not one but would be answered according to the ideas of priest and people, by the Bible. Its answer was final. The priest was the authorized interpreter of this book, and there all controversy ended.

Modern materialism held in itself but little dread for the parson. His answer was only, "do you want to live and die without God? Simply exist like a dog?" Few were brave enough to withstand the logic (?) of this argument, and the priest ruled with a hand of iron.

Ignorance will make a coward of the bravest of men. Place him over a submerged torpedo, and he will tremble, when he will walk boldly up to the cannon's mouth. Place him where he is surrounded by mystery, and he will be swayed like a leaf in the wind. But give him intelligence and an understanding of what he is to encounter, and he will stand steadfast. He wants a rock to stand upon. Spiritualism is that rock.

When the fear that with materialism all hope of immortality would be lost came upon him, he hesitated to embark into the investigation of systems of religion. When Spiritualism comes to him, he feels that if the sand of old is taken away from under his feet they will but rest on the solid rock beneath. Thus his courage comes again, and he is ready to do his work.

The Bible was said to contain all knowledge that was possible for man to obtain. It has been proven untrue. It was said to be the only competent moral guide. This has been proven untrue. It was said to be the only means we had of learning of the great powers of the universe; but we have learned that from the revelations of nature we can learn more than we can from any book, be it called sacred or profane, and that claim too is swept away. It was claimed to be infallible in all ways, but when once the searchlight of investigation was turned upon it, its errors and inconsistencies were shown so clearly that it could not stand the glare, and its claims to infallibility fell as a natural consequence.

With this fell the abodes of the mythical Gods, the home of mythical devils and in their places have arisen the modern ideas of life, love, heaven, hell.

To-day the so-called religions of the past are no more sacred. Deny it as you will, the people as a class no more bow and cringe to the dictates of the clergy. They no longer ask the advice of the minister in preference to all others. In fact, he is criticised, condemned and as frequently imprisoned as any other citizen, in proportion to his numbers.

What does this show? It demonstrates very clearly that the forty-nine years of Modern Spiritualism have been instrumental in assisting the emancipation of man in a mental and religious freedom. It demonstrates that to-day man is disposed to rely fully as much upon his own ideas regarding religion as he does upon any paid priest.

Mankind will do anything for a selfish motive. To build up their own mansion they will frequently attempt to tear down their neighbor's. But it does not always succeed. In the great majority of cases it fails. That will be the result in the present case. The clergyman seeing his hold slowly slipping, grasps harder, but slips again and again. Then he wants to know what it is that makes his followers so slippery that they slide out of his grasp so easily. He finds that many of them are greased with a knowledge of Spiritualism. He talks Bible to them. He threatens them with the same old threadbare threats, but they have lost their terrors. Then he attacks the stronghold itself, and he is ready to put down the enemy that has so slowly but surely encompassed him.

Without a doubt this is the true cause of the present agitation against Spiritualism in all its branches. There is but one way for orthodoxy to regain its hold: that is, by putting Spiritualism out of the way. It can never do so. The agitation thus began has extended too far. It has reached even the stories of the great book and heralded them far and wide from the strongholds of orthodox pulpits. Several clergymen of New York City even now say that a full compliance with all the stories of the Bible is not necessary to be a Christian. The more renowned biblical students decline to accept the literal ideas propagated, and Spiritualism cannot be put down, nor can the lost ground be regained.

The old system of orthodoxy is doomed. But, a new question arises. Upon the ruins of Roman and Grecian Mythology were builded a new system of religion resulting in the Roman Catholic Church. The "Mother of Harlots" as it has been termed. The children of that mother have divided into branches and have each attempted to gather in all the grain that has been harvested by the others. Will they leave any stone unturned in these efforts? Will they continually try to encroach upon the domain of their sisters, or will they go outside of the family and attempt to take control of Spiritualism? When they cannot ruin it, will they not attempt to rule it?

We must now face two propositions. First, ruin. Second, ecclesiastical rule. The effort now being made is to ruin us through the efforts of those high in the nation's employ. If failure results in that direction, another movement will succeed it.

We should effectually block the present movement. How? is the question. I do not believe these laws can be successfully opposed in the next few years, unless there is a more decided stand taken by Spiritualists. I do not mean by this that few are to do it, but by the united efforts of the Spiritualists of the land. In fact many of those who have been the fighters of the past few years are getting tired of standing the brunt of the battle and, after it is won, see those whose voice was not heard, whose generosity did not contribute one cent to the fund to aid the matter, and were fearful lest some of their neighbors should think they wanted to see the law suppressed, bragging about "What we have done."

Personal experience has shown me that when a battle of this kind has been fought in the past, the few have done it. Not the many. The mail has brought many letters such as: "Go on with your good work; the angels will bless you." But they do not contain many assurances that the writer is willing to assist in that blessing at the present by sending something to help defray the expenses of fighting the battle. Neither do the majority assist by appearing, and by their presence add a moral status to the case.

The last two are essentials if we wish to keep such laws down. But for the past year or two I have wondered if it would not be a good thing to let a few such laws pass, and insist upon their being enforced. I believe the moral lesson would be of greater benefit to Spiritualists than all the fighting that our workers are doing, opposing the passage of these laws, ever could do.

Let us take this subject right home to ourselves. Let us remember that we have a religion that has given comfort to thousands of sorrowing hearts that could not have been comforted in any other way half so effectually. Then when we do remember that, don't let us pat ourselves on the back and thank God that we have a religion that has not cost us a dollar in years, except when we went to see a medium.

Put some energy into Spiritualism. Put some vim into your religious life. Let the world around you know you live. Stir matters up a little, and we will have no trouble with offensive laws or prying, meddling people; but as long as we go on with orthodox preachers burying our dead and performing our marriage ceremonies, and absorbing our dollars that should go to the support of Spiritualism, just so long must we expect a continuation of the present agitation of laws prohibitive to Spiritualists and mediums. Each one's duty is clear. How many of us will do it.

SOUND LOGIC.

GOOD SHARP POINTS WELL STATED — AMMUNITION FOR SPIRITUALISTS—READ, REMEMBER, AND USE—THE SPIRITUALISTS PROTEST AT ST. LOUIS.

In 1888, I think it was, a bill was introduced in the House of Delegates, in St. Louis, Mo., precisely similar in all respects to the one introduced in the aldermanic Council of Chicago. That bill was advocated by two Roman Catholic attorneys, Stone and Wenzelick. It was reported in the Globe-Democrat and Republic, and the proceedings of the meeting to consider the bill under the heading given above.

I had returned to the city from Chicago, when meeting Brothers Goettler, Fay and Heniker, they placed in my hands a note from the then attorney of the Jay Gould Southwestern system of railways, himself a Spiritualist, requesting me to "go that afternoon before the House and defeat that Roman Catholic attack on Spiritualists.

I had no warning, no time for preparation, I went there, however, and any one who will take the trouble to read the report, contained in those two papers, will readily understand what was the power behind the two attorneys that introduced that bill.

The large chamber was filled with interested people for and against the measure. For three long hours we pointed out the damnable iniquity, injustice, persecution, and illegality of the bill. The papers, after calling attention to the prominent individuals and numbers present, thus speak of the proceedings:

"Judge Lee addressed the members on behalf of the Spiritualists and made a strong appeal for the defeat of the ordinance. Wenzelick answered that the bill was intended to interfere with those who claimed second-sight or communication with spirits. Judge Lee made an eloquent address in opposition to this claim, and said that existing law was ample to cover any actual fraud. As American citizens the Spiritualists claimed the rights to worship or think according to the dictates of their consciences. If pretending to a knowledge of future events was to be made an offense, there would be a good many penalties inflicted. He argued that the State Constitution prohibited any interference with religious beliefs or worship, and went on to say that temperance advocates and ministers of religion constantly assumed to foretell future events quite as much as Spiritualists. The Spiritualists would support the bill if the ordinance was made to include all who carried on the Roman Catholic, Protestant, Mormon or Jewish profession for money (great applause and continued laughter). It was unjust and absurdly antediluvian to discriminate against any religious denomination.

"Mr. Wenzelick, greatly annoyed by the favor with which Judge Lee's argument was received by the audience, explained that there was no intention to interfere with the Spiritualists as a profession, but only with those who made money by false pretenses. This gave Judge Lee his opportunity, and he was prompt to seize it, by sending a well directed retort into the argument of his opponents; he replied that then the House of Delegates and law-abiding City of St. Louis proposed to be accessories to fraud, to license crime. If there was a crime, the law imposed a penalty; and the House could not license a crime. If not a crime, then no license could be imposed.

"Mr. Fox, speaker of the House, thought no license should be imposed and the bill was laid over. (applause)."

The above is copied from the report in the St. Louis papers, and while it is fair in statement, does not fully report some of our strongest points, nor, the the often long continued applause when those points were driven home in the armor of the orthodox churches.

The point in this, to which I want to call the attention of Spiritualists in every city is: Our work is either a fraud, or it is not; if it is a fraud, no city, no law can license it; if it is not a fraud, no license can be imposed unless it includes those who obtain money from believers in other church denominations.

The burden of proof of its being a fraud devolves on the prosecution, and if we have good attorneys, then, on the ground that they prove Spiritualism a fraud—a crime—they totaly demolish all and every particle of the religious edifice in this world.

IN VINDICATION.

BELIEVES THE CONCANNONS ARE GENUINE MEDIUMS.

To the Editor:—In the issue of your paper of March 6th, there appears an article from Eva A. Cassell, which is so utterly at variance with the truth and facts in the case, that to one not knowing the parties in question, might be taken for the truth. We have no personal acquaintance with the writer of that article, not even knowing whether she be a Spiritualist or not. But being personally acquainted with the Mr. and Mrs. Concannon, having sat in their seances while they where under the strictest test conditions, we do cheerfully attest to the genuineness of their manifestations.

At a seance held at their cottage on the grounds of the Southern Cassadaga Spiritualists' Camp-meeting Association; (where they are engaged at the present time) on the night of March 6th, there were present Mrs. and Dr. H. H. Brigham, of Fitchburg, Mass; Mrs. O. L. Davis, of Cleveland, Ohio; Miss Pearl Town, of Allegan, Mich,; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Upsall, of Watseka, Ill.; Mr. and Mrs. T. T. Frances and Mr. Elmer Morrow, of Smithtown, Pa.; Miss E. Keenan, of Bradford, Pa.; Dr. R. H. Stillson, of Tidioute, Pa.; and the writer, of Tampa, Fla. A committee consisting of Mr. Frances was invited to accompany Mr. Concannon to the dressing-room. There, being disrobed, Mr. Concannon donned his cabinet clothing, consisting of black pants, coat and vest, and shirt bosom and collar only, as was testified to by Mr. Frances, the committee. Mrs. Concannon was taken in charge by Mrs. Davis and Miss Town, (all of which committees were investigators and not having as yet been convinced of spirit return) was thoroughly examined, by them, and found nothing upon her, except such garments as are usually worn by any lady on a warm evening (the night being quite warm). Mr. Concannon taking his seat in the cabinet, which had been thoroughly examined by all who so desired, had no sooner sat down than the spirit form of a lady appeared, dressed in pure white, she being at least a head taller than the medium. After several forms had appeared, the writer was invited into the cabinet by the guides, to place my hands across the forehead of the medium, he clasping my index finger with his hands. Thus forming a powerful battery. Scarcely one minute passed before my daughter appeared, coming up from one corner of the cabinet, directly through the floor, and taking on her full form. She approached me inside the cabinet, coming up to and kissing me. She then seemed to project herself directly through the curtains. She appeared within the circle, and was seen by all present, dematerializing outside the curtains. Mrs. Concannon taking the chair vacated by the writer, sitting between Mrs. O. L. Davis and Mrs. Keenan, at the time holding hands, could not not have possibly been in the least instrumental in producing this wonderful manifestation.

At the close of this seance, the parties above mentioned willingly gave their names in attestation of the facts here presented. Now a few words in regard to the charge of fraud upon the part of these mediums, who are known by all who have the pleasure of their acquaintance to be genuine and true, and we cannot forget that even you, Mr. Editor, have said that you believed it remained for Mr. Concannon alone, to prove the truth and genuineness of materialization. In regard to the statements made by Mrs. Cassell, as to the evidence of fraud on the part of these mediums, it is so at variance with the truth, and exparte, it is not worthy of notice. She does not give any evidence tending to prove them genuine, or any that went to show that the "raiders" carried their "finds" with them, as was testified to by many not Spiritualists. Let truth prevail and these worthy mediums will require no vindication for the good work they are doing. Yours for truth,

MUNICIPAL LAWS.

Whenever They Interfere with the Rights of Spiritualists, They Should Endeavor to Have Them Repealed at Once.

To the Editor:—It is with deep regret I read in The Progressive Thinker of the persecution of Mrs. Jennie Darrel, in Arizona. According to the statement she walked by night from Beebe to Tombstone, a distance of thirty-five miles across the arid desert, to evade arrest under a city ordinance, having just been released from the clutches of this same law by paying a fine of $50 for charging an admission fee to her materializing seance. I would like to inquire as to whether there is a single Spiritualist where our Sister was placed under arrest and fined, simply for exercising her inalienable rights. I should like to come in contact with such an ordinance as this. I would never rest until it was repealed.

A city ordinance in this city has just been repealed, charging clairvoyants $50 per annum for exercising this gift. After the arrest of two mediums, Mrs. Annie Wagner and Mrs. May Goodrich, I circulated a petition in the city which was signed by many prominent citizens, including three local clergy as follows: Father Nugent, Catholic; Rev. Lewis Gregory, Congregationalist; and Rev. Rollens, Baptist. This petition was read at the council meeting and referred to the city attorney, and he recommended that a new ordinance be drawn up, leaving out the word clairvoyant, and it now stands repealed. This leaves our city ordinance free of anything pertaining to mediums in any manner whatever.

I note the city of the home of The Progressive Thinker is threatened with this prevailing ordinance-epidemic against Spiritualists. Perhaps it is a good thing. I believe it will force the Spiritualists in this country to more thoroughly organize for the protection of themselves and mediums. It is not a very pleasant thing to be in the full enjoyment of a public or private seance, and have a burly policeman invade the room and place the medium under arrest, as has often been done to our knowledge. Let us cultivate combativeness up to such a degree that we will not become so insipid to our interests. Let us put forth a hand in every city, town and hamlet, and wipe from any municipal law what is detrimental to our cause.

Let me say to my brothers and sisters in Chicago, fight this ordinance to win; put forth your best efforts. If you get defeated, know that you fought to win.

IS IT PROPHETIC?

CURIOUS FACTS CONCERNING THE NEW UNITED STATES CERTIFICATES—FUTURE OF WOMAN FORESHADOWED—SEEMS AN INSPIRATION—A NEW "DANIEL" SOLVES THE SECRET—FOR THE BENEFIT OF OUR READERS.

Has the attention of any of the numerous readers of The Progressive Thinker been attracted to the prophetic nature of the new issue of 1896 United States Silver Certificates?

Take the One Dollar Bill for instance, and look at the figure of "The Woman" who "Lifts the Veil," who is pointing to the "Seat of Government" as not quite right, and who is calling the attention of the youth of the New Age to the errors made there, so that when they reach manhood then can carry along the principles contained in the Constitution to yet grander results.

The woman is clothed in a flag of stars upon a field, but where are the stripes? Evidently a new flag must be used to symbolize the greater freedom and higher liberty of the New Era, as indicated by the absence of the stripes.

Then the Constitution in its card form is emblematic of "The Little Book" spoken of in Revelations, which was held in the "Hand of the Angel."

The group of circles across the top and on the sides also have a mystic meaning (Five circles, then three, then five more). The sides also have five circles, four perfect and one on each side at the base not perfectly formed, signifying the completeness yet to come. The "One" in both corners forming a cross, while the cards at the two lower corners still pointing to the "Little Book," all have a mystical meaning in regard to the future, when there will be acknowledged a true brotherhood founded upon the true word, or the Sacred Scripture of the Ancients, which is yet to be understood in a higher, deeper and broader sense than man is now capable of expressing, because he has lost the key to its meaning.

Looking upon the reverse side of this bill, we see the medallions of Martha and George Washington. The woman at man's right hand, showing plainly that woman's place is first, (the right hand of power). The woman and the man working together in a higher and truer bond, is indicated by the "One" written across the upright column of the numeral, surrounded by the folds of the serpent, whose head is concealed behind the cross, symbolizing the Deity.

Then we have the female winged heads indicative of Thought, of spirituality, or the Holy Ghost of the Bible.

There are on this side also fourteen "ones," (two sevens) expressed in numerals and letters, which also give a prophetic meaning.

The figures of the woman and the man are before the open gate, or the untried future as represented by the clear space on each side of the heads.

Surely this certificate is prophetic of the future of woman as "she" is the moon, the moon always being called feminine and she, and silver; while the sun is always spoken of as he, or masculine and gold, or golden.

The Two-Dollar Bill has upon its face a group of figures with female heads, pointing to the fact again that woman lends, not in the ways alone that has confined her labors in the past, but in commerce and manufactures. The numerals and letters are six times two, (twelve) again a mystic number.

On the reverse of this bill (or in the back ground) we have the two medallions of Fulton and Morse, man as workers together with woman, and again the mystical number twelve, also the trinity of principles contained in the two in one, enfolded in the coils of the serpent with its head hidden in the Deific Emblem.

The Five-Dollar Bill represents man in the back ground, having prepared the way with his horses and chariots of power and his thunderbolts of might, for the advent of woman, who comes with wings as a quick helper or intuitional worker, working with Light as well as Might, as the man in the background has done and is doing, but in the future not alone but together, the woman and the man work hand in hand until the heights are won.

Woman's voice is to be heard in the land, as indicated by the Trumpeter, or teacher of higher and deeper truths; while gentle Peace broods softly over Governments and homes. On this side are seven fives. On the reverse of this note we have the heads of two of our loved and brave Generals, representing the power of man to prepare the way, but above them and equally prominent, we observe the woman of the Future, as represented by the female head with wings—which wings are stretched out over all the future, and from which descends the light and the blessing of a purer and higher womanhood and a nobler and grander manhood, typified by the rays of light descending from underneath the wings.

The emblem of Deity is before the woman, showing her to be high in her aspirations, and capable of being guided, while yet leading to "Ways of Righteousness whose paths are peace."

The woman appears on the reverse side, it not being yet the time for woman's reign, she being still held in bondage while being disciplined to become again the leader of the race.

Here also we have the seven fives, the arrangement of which in position indicate power and might. The color of these as well as previous issues of Bank Bills denote the Natural Law by which all truth is evolved.

This issue of 1896, or the Silver, or Woman's certificate is truly a prophecy, and whether recalled or no, the fact remains that they are the work of an Inspirationalist. LUCY M. BIXBY.

BLAMES SPIRITUALISTS

To the Editor:—I have just read your editorial on the attempt on the part of one of Chicago's aldermen, to muzzle the Spiritualistic movement by imposing a license of two hundred dollars on all mediums of the city practicing clairvoyance, healing, or psychometry. Now, Mr. Editor, I claim that Spiritualists are directly responsible for this condition of things as they now exist. Instead of standing firmly by mediums and healers in their grand and noble work, the most of the Spiritualists have been trying to do something to make Spiritualism popular, and consequently the mediums and healers have been left to starve and fight the battles for existence unaided and alone.

Nineteen-twentieths of the Spiritualists when sick employ old-school doctors—at least this has been my experience through observation for the twenty-five years I have practiced magnetic healing. Now, I hold, had the Spiritualists stood squarely for their mediums, and given opponents to understand they must keep their hands off the liberties and rights of the people to think and employ whomsoever they pleased, Brother Moulton, of Michigan, and yourself would not at the present time be asking Spiritualists to rally around the standard of freedom and demand equal and exact justice for all, irrespective of creed.

SAUL OF TARSUS.

A STORY WHICH COMES CLOSE TO ACTUAL EVENTS.

In a little western town, quite small at present and no bigger at the time I met the subject of this sketch, I was seated in the shade of his comfortable home, listening dreamily to his rugged, hard-handed philosophy, while I watched the shadows creep slowly up the distant "meetin' house" spire.

Brown was a preoccupied man: preoccupied with his own affairs to the disgust of his gossippy neighbors.

Brown! at the name comes before us a tall, heavy set man, with long, dark, dignified whiskers and a bald head. Not so with the man beside me at the time of which I write. He was of medium height, a trifle gray at the temples and wiry as a catamount. Bluish-gray eyes denoting physical activity took shelter under heavy brows. His somewhat prominent nose was made more so by rather sunken cheeks accentuated by his closely shaven face. While his firm-set mouth and determined chin said "courage and resolution," his action, said "modestly" as plainly as action, which speak plainer than words, could speak: openness and honesty exuded from the entire man.

Perseverance and energy in the right direction, even in the wilderness where he settled, the blossoming of which was owing to his efforts, had made Brown well-to-do. He had a charming wife who though like her husband lacking in "book larnin,'" did not lack inborn refinement and good hard sense. I will not say "common sense" for sense is not the commonest thing in the world.

The loveliest blossom that took root and grew into a beauteous flower under their united carefulness was their daughter Dorothea or "Doll" as they called her, and as she came down the garden path the flowers that bordered it seemed to smile in her pure young face.

As the sun sank further and deeper in the west, bathing the distant mountain tops in a flood of gold, and the heat had been fanned away by a gentle breeze that comes from nowhere in particular in that part of the country, and returns in the same direction on the reappearance of dawn, Dorothea let fall the sun-bonnet that had masked in her hair and protected her face, revealing a complexion in which the lily and the pink vied for supremacy. Her eyes were big and brown, her eyebrows delicate and arched, her lashes long and silky. Cupid's arrows were hidden in the glances beneath them, while her mouth was a pattern of his bow. Her hear was more golden than the mountain peaks kissed by the departing sun, and as luxuriant as if a waterfall from the invisible poured over her head, materializing at the crown and dematerializing at her waist.

"I owned the hull town onct," said Brown, in his rich western vernacular. "That is, I owned where the town is now, didn't I Doll?" Then without waiting for his daughter's confirmation he continued: "Its easy 'nough t' git rich when you ain't money t' run away from a boom er a settlin,' as the case may be." This was Brown's modest way of accounting for hard-earned wealth; for he had made two blades of grass to grow where there had been scarcely one, and the wilderness he had made blossom, he had made habitable.

"I was deceived in this spot when we first come here, tho' mother wasn't; was she, Doll?" Doll said "Yes, father," mechanically, though I am sure she had not heard the question, being absorbed in arranging a bouquet of the many flowers she had gathered coming up the path.

"Yes sir!" he continued, in spite of "Doll's" unintentional denial, "I was deceived in thinkin' the place no 'count; but people usually deceive us diff'rent. I remember, not long after this place commenced t' git settled, how they talked about a preacher comin' through from the east on his way t' Frisco, that was goin' t' shake us all up. We had a school an' meetin' house combined; not much like them you see yonder. Well, everyone in th' settlement was a studyin' scripter fur a week t' prepare their consciences fur th' comin' of th' "Western Talmidge" as the called him. Sunday come an' so did he, an' th' church was filled long 'for time fur meetin'.

"When I see him come up th' aisle led by Deacon Carter I was sorry I hed let th' deaconship go by, jus' t' hev led him into church, an' I said, luckily t' myself, Talmidge by Thunder!"

"Why, father!" exclaimed Dorothea turning suddenly and facing him. "I"——"Now you hesh, gal! I'm a tellin' this!"

His daughter, whom I hoped would take a more active interest in her father's story, now relapsed into silence.

"I'm goin' t' hear some preachin' now. I said, if I never did before, an' I kind o' settled myself as a cat does when she sights a rat. He was a tall man with side whiskers an' a big mouth an' looked jes' like th' pictures o' th' great preacher. Broad shouldered an' deep chisted as yo' ever see; an' a voice, I says t' myself, like the echo o' thunders on Gilgal. Ain't it Gilgal, daughter?"

"Yes father," she answered sententiously, though I doubt she heard the question, or if she did did not pose as an authority.

"When he got up t' talk, my ears must a' been longer'n my arms with listenen'. 'My voice shall be heard on Ararat,' said he, er on some moutain I f'rget th' name on, an' it sounded like a penny whistle. I put my head down an' chewed my coat sleeve, thinkin', as one will in them times, that ef he was t' call from th' top of a sand hill no one 'd ever hear 'im." Then Doll displayed two pretty rows of pearls as her laughter rippled out on the twilight.

"I knowed I'd wake her up!" said he roguishly as he resumed. "He talked about flyin' from temptation an' all that; an' I thought flyin' aint no use 'cause you'll run into more; the thing t' do is t' stand up and fight, an' when you win yo' got somethin' t' holler about."

"That's so," said he in response to my question, "I plum forgot. O' course it does seem kind o' strange that a man named Brown should be called 'Saul o' Tarsus.' Well there's a story connected with that," he continued laying his rough hand tenderly on his daughter's head. "There's a story connected with that. That took place afore this town was dreamed of, much less built. Civilization come with th' town. That's what they call tearin' down natural conditions an' building up artificial ones."

I made no comment on this homely bit of philosophy, and he resumed:

"That horse you see yonder wasn't over five years old then, an' chuck full o' go. Now he's only fit fur bein' well cared for an', extreme unction, I guess that's what they call it, when he dies. I've got a soul sir! they aint no doubt o' that; an' so 's a horse; fur they kin see what we can't, smart as we be."

Not wishing to interrupt what I was deeply interested in, the object of my visit in fact, I remained silent.

"When we come out an' settled here there want a house fur miles; nothin' but woods an prar'y an' them mountains you see yonder. Our little 'un, healthy as a b'ar, thank God, fur they want no doctors 'bout."

"Healthy as a b'ar!" Yes, I thought, and she has grown up with a rocky mountain grizzly in each one of her eyes.

As my interruption was mental, it did not disturb the flow of my host's interesting narrative.

"On th' romp fur all her four years was worth! watchin' us raise th' old house you see yonder; we turned it to a shed soon's we got better off. Fancy fixens," this retrospectively, "fancy fixens! Th' fancier th' fixens th' less fancy th' takin' care an' keepin' 'em up.

"Injuns? yes; but they won't hurt if they're let alone. They say 'no Injun's good but a dead un!' Taint so! I've seen whites no 'count livin' er dead. Death aint no wonder-worker! a dead devil's a livin' one every time. That aint nothing t' do with what I'm goin' t' say, but its truth.

"We needed a heap o' things in them days, an' as we hed raised a lot o' cattle, fat an' sleek as butter, we thought bes' t' replenish th' larder, as they say, by me drivin' 'em t' th' nearest settlement."

"There was dry goods fur mother, an' sox an' shoes fur the baby, fur children will climb after birds, crawl after aigs an' fall int' ditches if they's water in 'em. One mornin' bright an' early, I put Jim's saddle on an' rounded up th' herd. Five critters was th' extent of th' herd in them days; five hundred might be a small one now. Buffalo enough, but one milch cow was worth a herd o' buffalo when we settled here,

"I kissed the baby an' her mother and started off on a canter, the herd ahead o' me. I watched th' house till th' trail led into th' woods, an' th' last I see of 'em, was mother holdin' baby up an' it a throwin' kisses. I reached the settlement, sold my cattle, bot nough t' load a wagon an' th' finest doll th' place afforded an' started fur home. It showed some signs o' rain, but none of a flood.

"Darkness comes down quick after sun set, but a heap quicker when rain threatens."

It seemed but a moment since the sun had bathed in a ruddy glow the tips of the distant spires, and, even as he spoke, the glow died out suddenly, as does the last ember when it falls into a bed of fluffy ashes in the grate.

"Jim 'd whinner and cry like an uneasy, nervous mortal; an' more 'n once I was tempted to cut a gad, for he didn't need a lash as a steady diet. Then the shadows lengthened an' died out. Th' sky began to roll up clouds as black as ink. Th' wind commenced to play with th' tree-tops in a vicious, snarling and unsocial way I didn't like more'n Jim did."

"Well I rode like a man possessed on as dark a night's you ever saw. I say you ever saw, 'cause you couldn't a seen it only fur the lightnin'. Then come a rain that in th' open 'd a washed us off th' trail. Jim never whinnered after th' storm started. That was only a warnin' that it was comin'. The trail got so slippery an' the night so black, that even surefooted Jim was staggerin' like a drunkard. In th' dyin' out o' th' flashes I'd finger my pistol nervously, for every charred stump look human like an' every withered branch an arm reachin' for Jim's bridle.

"Th' wind got uglier every minute; it was a tornado, and hurled itself in a solid mass against th' trees an' fairly bore 'em of their feet. I tell you when the rain an' th' hurricane become a single force, damage is done. Jim seemed to know that I didn't know, and he'd wait fur flashes t' pick his way round th' trunks o' fallen trees an' some of 'em giants.

"The trail led round th' mountain an' we had that as a sort o' shelter on the right and on the left, too great swerving from the trail would a meant death to Jim an' me; either on the rocks that lined the sides of a steep gully, or in th' torrent that, grown in a half hour from a little almost dried-up brook at the bottom, was risin' rapidly, and runnin' like a millrace.

"Prayed? I prayed then if ever. O! not fur me, no s-i-r! for them I'd left at home; for our cabin was in th' open, an' God only knew at that time, but what there'd be nothin' there when I got there.

"'Twas the longest night I ever put in. But 'bout two or three in th' mornin, fur we travelled mighty slow, th' wind give a growl like an overloaded b'ar an' died out. I had my hand up t' my eyes a peerin' with all my might for a clearin' in th' darkness when I fancied I heard a cry. At first I tho't it was th' stream a swellin' with the rain, and then I thought it mought be a wolf, then I heard it again. I got off my horse and puttin' my ear to th' ground, Injun fashion, I listened again: not a sound! Then undoin' my rifle and gettin' my bowieknife handy. I mounted Jim and looked in every direction, though I couldn't see ten feet away from my nose. You see the cry had somethin' of th' young painter in it. Resolved to prepare myself for any shock, though a catamount mought a got pinned under a fallen tree and whined, I urged Jim ahead. Jim started, but got as far as a horse could that was tied fast. I touched him a little with my spur; no go. I prodded him; just a half-whinner and a nervous start. Could I've tied the critter without knowing it? a sort of involuntary action that is purely automatic at times. I leaned over an' reached all round his head, nothing held his head, nor his feet, for he had pranced uneasily on all four. Disgusted and balkin'! said I, I'll soon take that out o' you! So reachin' over to a half-fallen saplin', I cut a good sized gad, and, lettin' my fool temper go, I raised in my stirrups, grasped Jim's bridle tightly in my left hand an' raised my right arm with th' gad to give th' brute a surprise; when I felt my arm held right in the air by a grip like iron, and, as a flash, of, more fire than lightin', lit the wood about us, I could see a figure in front o' Jim; a figure of a size as tall as a saplin—and tremblin' as I was I observed yo' could see daylight through it, I was goin' to say, you could see lightnin' through it.

"Back East where I was raised I can remember when I was a boy, that 'bout midway 'tween our village an' the next, which was about three miles, there was an ol' buryin' ground fur the soldiers of th' war of 1812. If I was caught after dark with the old graveyard between me an' where I lived, I used to whistle approaching the place and in passin' it; but once by I needed all my breath fur a desperate run clean int' town. I was a believer in ghosts, just as any youngun is that is fond o' hearin' of 'em every night 'for bedtime, an' at bedtime has to lug the dog to bed t' keep 'em off.

"But time had drove all that out o' my head and out of my mind till here, right afore me, was this great big figger as white as snow, as transparent as mist and as as solid as a rock. I'm not a coward generally, but I tell you it was tetch-and-go twixt Jim an' me to see which'd shake th' hardest. Then, as this thing'er whatever it was, let go my wrist, quicker'n I can tell you I had a ball through it, but it never moved out of its tracks, only held tighter t' Jim's bridle an' pointed down among th' rocks with the other hand."

Just then the dog, a big fellow, a cross between a greyhound and mastiff came round the corner unperceived and poked his cold muzzle against my hand, and I tried to jump through the side of the house.

I told Brown I had tipped back too far and had lost my balance, though Dorothea, who I suspect was not so abstracted as she appeared, rose suddenly and without excusing herself took "Tom," the dog, into the house. I fancied, I could hear her and her mother laughing, possibly at my losing my balance.

"Yes sir," continued Dorothea's father, "I was tremblin' clean through, fur the thing couldn't be shot, so it couldn't be human. The minute I could get my heart down out of my throat, I spoke out encouragin' like t' Jim an' touched him with my spur; no go! Man er devil, what ever you be, I'm goin' on—I thought t' myself, as I tightened the reins and jamming the rowels deep into Jim's flanks I shouted—Git up!

"In less'n I can tell it there was a flash that nevr come from nowhere but right in front of me an' I was lyin' at the bottom of the gully an' both feet in th' rushin', swellin' stream. Then, like Saul o' Tarsus, I called out as soon as I got my breath; Lord, what wilt thou have me do? Then, sir, I heard that cry again, not a rod off. I staggered to my feet and began gropping about an' prayin' fur light; when, just as if this thing could reach the very sky, the dark broke away a moment an' the palefaced moon stole from cloud to cloud like an Injun on th' trail, an' I could see kind o' half-burried in th' mud a little human form. At the sight o' somethin' human near me an' needin' help, my courage all come back an' I dug the poor little thing out, and takin' it in my arms I struggled my way up the bank that in less'n an hour after was covered by th' risin' torrent.

"I never expected to see Jim again 'fore I got home, but just as I reached the top I heard his whinner of welcome right alongside.

"I knew what I held was a child, likely Bill Jones's; they lived some miles away on th' nearest clearin'. Its little arms and legs was bare and its hair all matted with th' mud that had washed down from the rocks. Its face was about as muddy an' briar-scratched as its feet; and it never woke till I reached home, it was that tuckered.

"I fixed my bundles, mounted Jim and wrappin' my coat round the youngun, I clicked t' Jim and, with a tickled little knowin' whinner, he started off as slick as you ever see.

"It wasn't long afore dawn begun t' break and brighter'n th' dawn was the sight of my cabin in th' distance, an' lit up like a church; it seemed as if every candle we had was burnin' all its night. When I got near 'nough I could see the Joneses and mighty glad I was, fur I had made up my mind t' leave th' child an' after feedin' t' ride over t' their place with th' good news. Mrs. Jones was ringin' her hands and goin' on like a crazy woman, and Jones too, till he caught sight o' me an' flew into th' house a draggin his wife after him by sheer force.

"While I was thankin' God fur makin' me th' instrument o' His mercy, I was plannin' like a schoolboy how I'd kind o' steal in unconcerned like an' surprise 'em. So urgin Jim into a trot, I rode t' the log stable an' slidin' out o' th' saddle I went with my sleepin' burden clean round the house an' come up on tother side.

"When I reached the door I heard Jones say kinder under his breath: 'My God, here's Saul!' and then my wife, with a face like chalk: —'Don't tell him; it'll kill him!' then fell all in a heap in a faint.

"I tore th' coat off the child an' held her to the light—it was 'Doll!' an' I dropped on my knees like I'd been shot, child 'n' all and thanked God fur given her back; fur sendin' his angel t' me just as he did to Saul o' Tarsus.

"That's her," he concluded, rising as Dorothea came to call us to supper, "and,"—drawing her affectionately to him as we went in—"She's why I'm called—'Saul o' Tarsus.'"

INCREASE IN CRIME.

A STATEMENT THAT SHOULD EXCITE ATTENTION EVERYWHERE.

To the Editor:—If the people of Springfield are not saved it will be their own fault Three or four professional "sky pilots" are preaching every evening to crowded audiences. One of them "saved" nearly 200 souls in two weeks. If they keep up the present pace there will not be a single "sinner" in the city in a few months, But still the increase of crime goes on in a Christian land as will be seen by the following extract:

"In charging the grand jury at St. Joseph, Mo., Monday at the opening of the criminal court Judge Culver made a statement regarding the rapid increase of crime in the United States that is alarming. Referring especially to the crime of murder, the judge said that prior to 1886, less than 1,000 murders and justifiable homicides were committed annually in the United States. In 1886 the number reached 1,449; 1887, 2,335; 1888, 2,884; 1889, 3,176; 1890, 4,290; 1891, 5,906; 1892, 6,791; 1893, 6,691; 1893, 6,615; 1894, 9,800; 1895, 10,121, while it is estimated that in 1896 the lives of almost 14,000 of our fellow-citizens were taken by their fellow-men. These facts are not only tenable, but so astounding as to be almost beyond belief. With all our boasted civilization and progress, the fact yet stares us in the face that we are a nation of red-handed murderers. No European nation has in proportion to population as many murderers as we have. Even Italy, known as the most murderous of nations, has annually less than one-eighth as many murders with one-half as great a population. All other forms of crime are increasing in about the same proportion.

"'In our own State,' he said, 'we have no accurate compilation of statistics on this subject, but a good idea can be formed of the facts when it is known that within the past four years the number of persons convicted of crime has increased 30 per cent. A part of this increase must be accounted for on account of the increase in population, but the increase in crime so far exceeds the growth in population that we must look to other causes for an explanation.'" WHAT IS RELIGION.

PRACTICAL REFLECTIONS AND SUGGESTIONS.

I see B. R. Anderson has made an attempt to define religion, and while he is very apt in his illustrations, I would like to make an effort to clear up the matter somewhat further. I will begin by saying I never mix my morality with my religion.

I believe a clearer conception will be gained of both by holding them as entirely distinct from each other.

Morality has relation to our dealings with our fellow creatures here in this life, while religion has reference to our Creator. It is one of the most common observations to see people very pious and yet very immoral, and vice versa. This fact is very puzzling to the mass of mankind that believe a truly religious person must of necessity be moral, for they are taught that morality is always included in true religion. The dictionary says religion is a system of faith and worship. I would omit the word "system," and say simply that religion is faith in a Creator and reverence for him or it, according as one believes in a person or a Creative energy.

Belief in and reverence for a Deity depends primarily on the mental and spiritual qualities of the individual, and secondarily on whether those qualities have been developed and called into activity; the same as love depends on the inherent qualities of the lover and also on whether those qualities have been developed and called into special activity. The religious faculties are generally made active in connection with some particular system, as the Christian system, the Mohammedan system etc., but this is not necessarily the case with those who are sufficiently enlightened to perceive that religious emotion proceeds from natural innate qualities, rather than from a miraculous infusion of the Holy Spirit.

Now I for one do not believe the emotions of love and reverence for the supreme are superfluities that men in their manliness ought to try and rise above. When analyzed, both sex love and love for the Deity are purely ideal; but I do not believe either should be extirpated from the human breast. I believe both emotions have their uses, and we should permit both to make us as happy as possible. But the world needs a great deal of light in relation to both religion and love, and whenever one is enabled to move in the light of reason, the phantom of superstition and the spirit of persecution will have fled.

To believe in creation is not superstition. It is more rational to believe there is a cause for existence, than to believe there is existence without cause; and cause for existence cannot be less than creation. Your idea of what that cause is is your God, no matter whether it is personified, or considered simply as a formless force.

Your correspondent uses one expression that I wish to enter my protest against, because I consider it false in fact and materialistic in its logic: I do not believe sound is dependent on the tympanum for its existence. If this were so there would always be sound where was a tympanum, and the tympanum in a dead person, being a mere organic structure, would be as efficient as in a live one. It is better to say the tympanum is an instrument through which the person recognizes sound. The sound has to be there, or the tympanum could not convey it. And the spirit has to be behind the tympanum, or the tympanum is no good.

All the so-called sciences were formulated by materialists, and as a natural consequence rest upon a materialistic base—a base that is logically opposed to any individual existence after the change that we call death. Spiritualists put themselves in a contradictory position by accepting these materialistic premises. The time is close at hand when those who believe in spirit existence will have a scientific philosophy in harmony with it.

Spiritualists by accepting materialistic premises as a base for their philosophy have made it almost impossible to spread Spiritualism for many years, and in this way, and by a cowardice that is almost universal, have created an apathy among thousands that makes them listless lookers-on, instead of earnest workers. What Spiritualist dares investigate in mundane matters outside of the lines that orthodoxy has enclosed? What object has been brought forward by Spiritualists for the world to work for that commands the approval of all the best of our people, on both sides of the death line? Is there anything that separates them from the great mass of agnostic and orthodox, except the belief that spirits can and do communicate with those in earthly form?

As far as my knowledge goes, whenever any spirit has handed down a new thought for the guidance of the people of this earth, the force of the suggestion has always been neutralized by conflicting communications. So on every question of life and conduct for elevating the world to a higher plane of existence, the people of this world have to feel their way along as they did before the advent of Spiritualism.

I am not aware as there is one point partaining to this life in which Spiritualists are ahead of Unitarians. I will own this dearth of something to work for has been disappointing to me. I do not wonder that so many are tired of phenomena and platitudes. I suggest that Spiritualists lead in an organization for arbitration in equity between individuals instead of law; and arbitration between all nations, instead of war. I suggest that they unite in voluntary abstinence from liquor and tobacco. This would be business, it would be life business for the present life; and the truly philanthropic cannot be long satisfied unless they believe they are accomplishing something useful. Is there sufficient life in Spiritualism to make a practical move?

"History of the Inquisition." Every citizen of our country should read this concise history of that Romish churchly institution known as the Inquisition. The animus of Romanism against all institutions, beliefs and parties not in conformity with the ruling powers of the Romish hierarchy is plainly shown in these statements of veritable history. The devilishness and murderous malignity of the "Holy Inquisition" is scarcely paralleled in all the world's records of inhuman atrocities. MATERIALIZATION.

THEORIES EXPLANATORY OF APPARENT FRAUD—THE MATTER DEMANDS JUDICIOUS STUDY.

To the Editor:—The recent alleged expose of fraud in the materialization seance at Ayer's Temple in Boston is but one instance in many similar, when the medium has been proven genuine, has given seances under test conditions, and there is apparently no motive for trickery and duplicity.

The last issue of The Progressive Thinker reviews the matter of the court trial on appeal, and final decision justifying the raiders.

We have Mrs. Cassell's statement, the Judge's charge, and the decision of the jury, and as stated, the matter is left for the consideration of Spiritualists.

How can results seemingly so diametrically opposite, be reconciled?

A medium is either honest or dishonest, genuine or fraudulent.

Is there not something wrong in our investigations and inferences drawn therefrom?

We cannot reason on a priori ground. In phenomena produced on two planes, as the spiritual and material, we cannot say of it that like causes produce like effects. To listen to the reason of many who assume to know, we must limit the power of spirit within very narrow bounds. There are many Spiritualists who disbelieve the phase of materialization. They have not had the opportunity for experimentation in that line, or have been unfortunate in their investigations. To those who know the facts, there is scarcely any bounds to the manifestations of spirit intelligences when furnished proper conditions.

There are all degrees of materialization, from a hand to full form; from the ethereal to the most tangible.

Material substances can be disintegrated in the space of a thought, and be reproduced again.

The phenomenon of the production of flowers, fruits, etc., within the closed walls of a room, is well attested.

The materialization and dematerialization of lace, and various garments is a fact.

Mediums have been secured in every way that ingenuity can suggest and the most marvelous phenomena produced.

They have been in wire cages or cabinets under lock and key, and sealed, and yet have been brought through the wire instantly. All this the writer has witnessed, not only once, but repeatedly, and numerous witnesses can substantiate the facts. In view of these extraordinary facts, is it incredible that the cabinet controls may introduce articles of clothing and drapery, and so dress up spirit forms, or the entranced medium if they wish to use him for impersonation, and then before the close of the seance spirit away the articles?

In such case it is reasonable to assume that if the conditions are disturbed abruptly, the said paraphernalia would be found in the cabinet. We have had practical illustrations of such occurrences.

On the other hand, if any medium, or person pretending to be such, is so degraded as to prostitute his or her gifts, and to wilfully misrepresent what purports to be from spirit, such person should be held up to contempt, and suffer deserved punishment. If they have confederates, trap doors, articles of drapery concealed, or enter into any collusion for the purposes of deception, there is no excuse for them whatever.

I draw the line against such, and every true Spiritualist should brand them as they deserve.

But the majority of alleged exposes of materializing mediums is of a different character, and is the result of a want of knowledge of the subtile laws governing this phase of manifestation.

It cannot be understood in one sitting, or a dozen, but the subject requires close study and experimentation.

The medium is extremely sensitive and is under hypnotic or psychologic influences from other minds incarnate or excarnate. He may be used by the guides and controls in a way that causes suspicion on the part of the sitters.

When placed under the most rigid test conditions and securely bound, the operating spirits may release the medium with perfect impunity.

Now in the matter of the case of Mr. Concannon, and in view of facts to be stated, it does not seem reasonable that he or his wife furnished the robes and other paraphernalia, as was alleged, or that he could, outside of spirit power, produce the manifestations usually occurring at his seances.

Mr. Concannon gave a number of seances at private residences in New York and Brooklyn a year ago, which the writer attended. A part of the time Mrs. Concannon was ill and did not accompany him at all, and the charge that she smuggled in the paraphernalia is utterly fallacious. There it not one who attended the seances, who is not fully satisfied that the strict test conditions admitted of no trickery.

These conditions are pretty well-known. After he was seated in the cabinet, with absolutely nothing concealed about his person or in the cabinet, and then securely bound, no living person was permitted to approach the curtains drawn across a solid corner of the room, and forming the cabinet, until after a form emerged therefrom.

The first was usually a female guide, arrayed in a profusion of white lace. This was followed by others. They advanced well into the room and their faces were plainly seen as they removed their veils.

By what alchemy could the face of the medium, with dark eyes and heavy mustache, be transformed into the most delicate female features, and in some cases having blue eyes? Will the wise ones tell us? We have heard no explanation of this.

Male and female spirit forms appeared and identified themselves to their mortal friends. We don't believe that these facts can be explained away or accounted for, except on the spiritual hypothesis. Much more might be said, but space will not allow, and we wish to draw this article to a close.

If investigators, whether Spiritualists or not, who are earnestly seeking for the truth wherever it may lead, have had their confidence shaken in this important phase, in consequence of the controversy so frequently brought up, will but carefully study the facts, and read up the testimony of others, they cannot doubt its verity, and will settle down into the conviction that our departed friends and kindred can make their presence known in material, tangible forms, when proper conditions are furnished. It is no more incredible then numerous beautiful phases of manifestation and its acceptance will insure peace and happiness.

"Living is an art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the arts."—THOMAS STARR KING.

This book gives an admirable course of study in ethics, and supplies a long-felt want of an ethical text-book especially adapted to the comprehension of children, as well as older persons whom it is wisely and appropriately designed to interest while teaching them valuable ethical lessons.

The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principles of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in children's lyceums. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. It is a most excellent book and should be widely circulated.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

BADLY WORRIED.

The New York Observer is probably the oldest and ablest of the Presbyterian papers published in America, and is reputed the most radical. Its vision is doubtless larger than any other sectarian organ; because it is largely sustained by the Christian pulpits in every part of the country, hence it overlooks the whole field at a glance. The editor seems specially worried over the "higher criticism," which bids fair at an early day to not only detract against the infallibility of the Bible, but throw a doubt upon its inspiration. In a late issue the following appeared in its editorial columns:

"Much of Biblical criticism of the form at present popular is really in spirit and method the secret foe of supernaturalism. Of the critical mode of banishing the supernatural from the Bible, Prof. Green, of Princeton, has well remarked, that it is the most plausible as the most effective method of accomplishing this result, because the animus of the movement is concealed, and the desired end is reached, not by aiming at it directly and avowedly, but as the apparently incidental consequences of investigation, pursued professedly for a different purpose. It is in view of such facts as these that the gravity of the situation, which even amounts to a theological crisis, appears. That here and there a teacher, perhaps a clergyman, should stand forth as the exponent of radical views of Biblical criticism might not be so alarming a circumstance; but when we perceive that such utterances are excused or even applauded by multitudes, that they delude Christians and delight Infidels, we are forced to recognize that this radicalism is symptomatic of a widespread decadence of belief in the supernatural."

The Progressive Thinker begs leave to assure the old fossils of a past age that "trouble" has only just commenced. Every move of the churches to give another turn to the Inquisitorial thumbscrew brings hundreds of new recruits to the ranks of the Liberals. The people are too intelligent to be forced by legal enactments, to support obnoxious measures having in view their own enslavement.

REPLY TO A CORRESPONDENT.

Yes, let them tell the story Christians invented hospitals, and there was none before their day, but turn to Vol. 18, p. 587, 2d col. of Encyclopedia Britannica, 9th edition, and read:

"Asoka became a Buddhist about [B. C.] 263. He then founded hospitals for men and beasts throughout his realm, planted places where nothing had grown before, and provided wells and grew trees along the roads for the refreshment of man and beast. Further, he tells us, he caused his example in these things to be followed by his neighbors, whether Southern or Western. Among the latter Antiochus, King of the Greeks, has the first place."

Antioch, on the Orontes, where Christianity received its name, according to the Acts, was built by a son of this Antiochus, who named the city after his father. As the founder of the city died 280 years before our era, and the Christians did not assume the name until after A. D. 43, it follows "hospitals for man and beasts" were known even in Antioch probably near 300 years before a Christian was named. That, however, is only a discrepancy between Christian claims and historic facts, which the inquirer will settle to please himself.

NEWS FROM THE FRONT.

The latest advices from the East, as we write, represent the united allied powers as ordering the removal of the Greeks from Crete, within six days from the 1st inst.; that King George of Greece is reported to have said, he will yield to no admonition, and is ready for war with Turkey. The populace, at the close of a public meeting in Athens, protesting against the action of the powers, rushed through the streets shouting, War! war! war! Gladstone is said to be boisterous in defense of the Greeks. He has the air of a religious monomaniac.

Turkey is mobilizing her troops on the Greek frontier, and the dispatches say, is more ready for war than Greece.

By the time we go to press we may hear of "resounding arms and bloody battles."

"TWO BRUTES."

A bill was pending in Congress during the last days of its session, which prohibited the transmission by mail or telegraph, a detailed account of any prize-fight. This drew out the remark from Mr. Morse that he hoped the then pending fight in Nevada would result in the two brutes killing each other. Maybe the member of Congress reflected the feelings of a majority of the American people. The bull-fights in Spain are brutal enough, and denote a degraded civilization. The idea of hundreds crossing the continent, expressly to see "two brutes" pommel each other, is a serious reflection on the age in which we live.

PROPHECY AFTER THE EVENT.

A patron writes from New Orleans expressing a desire for authorities in confirmation of the statement of The Progressive Thinker of February 20, that the Bible prophecies were written long after the events predicted transpired.

There is no question others will like facts in the same direction, for the subject is a fruitful one, as it strikes at the very root of divine revelation. If the prophets, instead of telling what was about to transpire were only reciting what had already occurred, then they were frauds of the same character with the priests and monks of the present day who are still peddling these old wares as events yet in embryo.

While the Bible was guarded by statutory provisions, punishing with imprisonment all persons who called in question the sacred text, carrying out practically what the Inquisition had done in a former age, it was impossible for critics to show the falsity of the holy claims. As those barbarous laws have become obnoxious and obsolete with advancing knowledge, there is no longer reason for further suppression of the truth.

Recent Biblical critics have proved almost conclusively, that the Pentateuch, and all the pretended early history and prophecies of the Jews, were not written earlier than the period of Ezra, about 445 years before our era. The frequent reference in those narratives to events that transpired centuries after the period churchmen claim they were written, furnish all the proof a reasoning mind requires of the falsity of their claim. It is apparent to scholars, and is generally conceded, that those pretendedly ancient books are mosaics—fragments of earlier writings, picked up anywhere, made by whom and when no one can know. They were brought together by some later compilers who wove them into books, as we have them now. The critics, by arts peculiar to their craft, are able to separate them into parts, and show where one fragment ended and another commenced. These illustrations are too numerous, and too well known to require references at this time.

W. R. Greg, in his Creed of Christendom, p. 131, Chicago edition, giving as his authority, DeWette, one of the ablest theologians of modern Germany, for a time Professor of Philosophy and afterwards Rector of the University of Heidelberg, says:

"In the case of nearly all the prophets we have little external or independent evidence as to the date at which their prophecies were uttered, and none as to the period at which they were written; while the internal evidence on these points is dubious, conflicting, and, in the opinions of the best critics, generally unfavorable to the popular conceptions. The Books of Kings and Chronicles, in which many of these prophecies are mentioned, and the events to which they are supposed to refer, are related, were written, or compiled in their present form, the former near the termination of the Babylonian Exile, or somewhere about the year B. C. 530, i. e., from 50 to 200 years after the period at which the prophecies were supposed to have been delivered; while the latter appear to have been a much later compilation, some critics dating them about 260, and others about 400 years before Christ."

"The article "Daniel, Book of," in the Encyclopedia Britannica, was written by Rev. Prof. Cheyne. In the fourth paragraph of that paper it is stated:

"Recent researches have shown that the official Targum, or Aramic translation of the Pentateuch, the earlier historical books, and the prophets was thrown into its present form at Babylon on the basis of a work composed in Palestine."

Other researches raise a violent presumption that the whole of those writings were productions of the period of the Babylonian captivity, save such as Daniel, which were written several centuries after.

The evidences in Daniel that the book was written after the Alexandrian conquest, and after his death B. C. 323, and the division of his empire among his four principal generals, are overwhelming. Three Greek words, the name of musical instruments, "so exact," says the orthodox M. Lenormant, "that they must have been taken from the lips of a Greek, an impossibility before commercial intercourse was established between Greece and Babylonia, after the age of the Seleucidae." Alexander's conquest, his death, and the division of his empire among his four generals are told with such particularity as would be impossible to one not familiar with the history of those events. The ablest critics, who follow the old lines of thought, fix the period when Daniel was written, as about B. C. 168, near the close of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. Its purpose was to influence that monarch, and the allusions to him, though in the form of prophecy, were easily understood, because of its directness. Hitzig, a German Biblical critic, found the period when Daniel was written as B. C. 170 to 164. Says Smith's Dic. of the Bible: "This opinion [of Hitzig] has found, especially in Germany, a very wide acceptance. and Lucke [a German theologian] ventures to pronounce it 'a certain result of historical criticism.'" Again, says Smith: "The real grounds on which most modern critics rely in rejecting the book, are the 'fabulousness of its narratives,' and 'the minuteness of its prophetic history.'" Hitzig says: "The contents of the book are irrational and impossible."

Daniel is more frequently quoted by Christian writers, and is more fully relied upon as an aid to its claims that the system is heaven-born, than is any or all of the other prophetic books, hence the attention we have turned to it; but the others are equally vulnerable, and are unworthy of acceptance as prophecies. That style of writing history seems to have ended with Daniel, the people having become too intelligent to be further deluded by that method of recording events.

ORIGIN OF THE MOVEMENT.

On several occasions it has been incidentally mentioned in these columns that the first movement looking towards the settlement of national disputes by arbitration originated with Liberals. That credit belonged to Ezra H. Heywood, who, in 1865, called the first peace meeting. He drafted the declaration of sentiments, and afterwards wrote the constitution of the Universal Peace Society, still in existence, with headquarters in Philadelphia. Mr. Heywood was a graduate of Brown University. He was reared a Calvinist; but he broke with the church because of its equivocal position on the slavery question, and its hostility to reforms generally. He also organized in 1867, at Worcester, Mass., the first Labor Reform League, still in existence. Mr. Heywood was derided by the church because of his radical views, and died a few years ago in consequence of those persecutions.

Cowardice is not synonymous with prudence. It often happens that the better part of discretion is valor.—Hazlitt.

TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY

As Vividly set forth by Madison. C. Peters, Pastor of the Bloomingdale Reformed Church, in the New York Daily Journal.

The assessed value of New York City church property, exclusive of parsonages, is $51,217,525. Walk up Broadway from Rector street, and out Fifth and Madison avenues, and from these streets alone you can see the underestimated value of church property in New York. The great estates of Trinity and the Collegiate churches alone are estimated at $50,000,000. Two hundred millions of dollars is something like a conservative estimate of the value of the church property of the metropolis, and when we remember that the assessed value of the real estate of the city is less than $2,000,000,000, it can easily be figured out how highly oppressive exemption becomes to other tax payers. The taxes have to be paid, and the property that is exempt, or rather omitted from the tax roll, is simply spread upon the other property. Everybody's tax goes up at least one-tenth. The American people would rise up in rebellion against direct taxation for church support, but what is exemption from taxation but an indirect State support of the Church, a virtual subsidy for its support, and at the expense of the general public? The State avoids a deficiency in its revenues by transferring to other property increased taxation, not by the voluntary action of the taxpayers, but by compulsion of law, all of which is out of consonance with our republican institutions. The founders of our republic wisely seperated Church and State. But if we are taxed for the support of churches, it cannot justly be said that the Church and State are separated.

The churches enjoy no immunity from the operations of the laws of God. They place roofs upon their buildings to keep out the rain, and put up lightning rods to prevent the lightning from striking them. If God does not vary his laws for the benefit of the churches, why should the State be expected to do so?

It is argued that many churches are not self-sustaining at present, and that to tax them would render them still less so. Thousands are less able to provide for their children because of the tax collector. Why should the laborer pay taxes upon his humble home and the religious corporation be exempted? Make all property bear its just and equal share of taxation and you lessen the laboring man's burden. When the workingman feels that his burden is heavier because the magnificent possessions of the Church are omitted from the tax roll, do you wonder that the Church loses its power over him? Tax churches and only those able to bear taxes will dare to be extravagant. Tax churches and modest buildings will be erected where they are most needed instead of a few imposing structures in the fashionable quarter. Every taxpayer in the State has his percentage of State tax correspondingly increased because of the needlessly expensive church properties of the cities, churches which he may never enter.

The saloon keeper by force of law is compelled to help pay the taxes on my church, in the use of which I denounce his infernal traffic. If the saloon keeper is taxed to support my church, in all fairness he ought to have something to say in its management. "No taxation without representation."

Churches are undoubtedly a public benefit, but if the doctrine of benefits be furnished as a reason for exemption on behalf of religious corporations, it refutes itself by proving more than the State can admit without bankrupting itself, for there are other institutions which are public benefits. It costs the community something to enjoy property, and if the Church paid taxes, it would pay only its honest share to secure its enjoyment of the use of property.

Taxation of church property is to the interest of American principles, and in harmony with the experience of nations. Taxing one man for the propagation of another man's religion is admittedly unjust, and, moreover, it is a relic of the principle of Church and State alliance inherited from the Old World, and not yet eliminated from our political system.

DR. T. L. NICHOLS.

Dr. Nichols was inveigled to Rome, by Jesuitical priests, professedly to enter the priesthood. He was made to believe he could revolutionize Catholicism, and bring that church into the support of his peculiar views, hence his reason for going to its head to commence his labors. He left New York near thirty years ago, telling American friends of his purpose. He wrote those friends on the eve of his leaving England for Rome, promising to write again as soon as he reached that city. But no such letter ever came to hand, so far as we can learn. In all probability when he reached the Eternal City, then ruled by the Pope, he was thrust into a dungeon, as multitudes of others have been, who were thought dangerous to the interests of the Holy See. Mr. Adams has our thanks for the little information he has given on the subject. Has anyone any later facts?

DOOMED.

Some twenty years ago the Catholic journals of Spain, Italy and Belgium, joined by the priests, clamored for the restoration of the Inquisition, and asserted that without force the church was doomed. It is very apparent the Protestants have reached the same conclusion, from the multiplicity of laws pending in all the State Legislatures, with severe penalties attached, in aid of the tottering system.

SPIRITUALISTS OF NEW YORK.

Arouse to the importance of having a large State Convention at Syracuse, April 13, 14 and 15. Let the Spiritualists of the old Empire State show the world that they are alive and realize the necessity of organization. Sacrifice something, if necessary, that your community may be represented. If there are only one or two in a town have a meeting of those from several towns or a whole county, but be represented. Don't wait until too late and then make excuses.

If each one will do their duty, and not wait for someone else to move, it will be one of the grandest conventions ever held by our people. If there is no one in the vicinity able to bear the expense alone, of attending the convention, a small contribution from each will make the burden light.

Besides the business sessions there will be mass-meetings in which able speakers and mediums will take part; there will also be an excellent musical program.

One and a third rates on the certificate plan have been secured on the railroads.

A fine hall has been secured for the occasion. Headquarters will be at "The Vanderbilt" Hotel where special rates can be obtained with excellent accommodations.

Where there is no society, have credentials signed by those present and sent in soon. Address Frank Walker, Hamburg, N. Y.

INTERESTING NOTES OF PERSONS AND WORK—LETTER FROM MRS. M. T. LONGLEY.

To the Editor:—The days speed rapidly along in this land of fruit and flowers, and we can hardly realize that so many weeks have passed since my last was penned for your columns. The work here is flourishing as far as a widespread interest in the phenomena of Spiritualism is concerned. As for the philosophy, it is presented here and there by able speakers to the hungry few who desire to be fed of the spirit and to be uplifted to an understanding of the spiritual nature of man here as well as hereafter.

Dr N. F. Ravlin, one of the most eloquent and highly inspired speakers of the new dispensation, has been here for a number of weeks, but he found it impossible to get engagements that would pay him sufficient for the most humble living, and he has departed for Fresno, where he hopes to do a good work for the cause and earn sufficient for the support of himself and his invalid wife. Mrs. Ravlin is a charming little lady who wins the love of all whom she meets. It seems to me that there is something wrong among Spiritualists when such useful and talented speakers as Dr. Ravlin and many others are allowed to go wandering from place to place seeking employment, while charlatans and mountebanks can fill the hall at ten cents a head. I do not mean by this that all who appear on the public platform as test mediums here or elsewhere are tricksters. Far from it. I know that many honorable and genuine mediums are to-day voicing the messages of the angels and giving undoubted evidence of spirit identity to the skeptical public; upon the platform, and I bid them God-speed in their good work. But all the same I know, as do many others know and deplore the fact, that upon the platform of many spiritualistic societies frequently appear as test mediums, and psychometric readers, individuals whose bold effrontery and bare assurance alone give them passport to the attention of the public, and whose claims are accepted and applauded, whose tricks are condoned and whose assurance is admired for its very boldness. And these people draw the crowd of curious, wonder-seeking, sensation-loving persons who follow after them seeking for a sign, while such able instructors as Dr. Ravlin, Professor Bowman and many other bright lights, lecture to less than one half the number that the phenomenalists attract.

True, quality not quantity should be considered in the elements that tell for good works, and the smaller audiences of Dr. Ravlin may make up in brains, aspiration and spirituality for the greater number of witless people who rush to hear a so-called medium assure one man that he—the man—ate ham and eggs for supper and tell another that he wears a plaster on his back. Just such statements as these have been publicly made in this city, and though they may show some occult power on the part of the medium, I fail to see how they are connected with Spiritualism or conducive to the uplifting and spiritualizing of souls.

Among the really wonderful mediums who have given true evidence of immortal life to the hungry multitude in Los Angeles this winter are Mr. E. K. Earle, Mr. Slater, and Mr. and Mrs. Fred P. Evans; these good people I mentioned in my last letter. Among the local mediums who in public and private have done and are doing good work for the cause are Mrs. Chutter and Mrs. Baldridge.

Mrs. Sandford Johson is a slate-writer of this city, an honest, conscientious woman and a good medium. Mrs. Carlyle Petersilea is a clairvoyant who frequently at the public meetings of the First Spiritual Society—which have of late been opened free to the public, and are well attended by thoughtful, intelligent people—describes the spirit intelligences that she sees, to persons in the audience. I am always pleased to work on the platform with Mrs. Petersilea, and just here I will state that my beloved guide, Spirit Pierpont, frequently delivers a lecture through my organism at the Sunday evening meetings of the First Spiritual Society.

Carlyle Petersilea, the gifted musician, vocalist and author, whom all the world knows for the talents which are his, is musical director of the First Society, and he is doing a grand work in the musical line for the people of this city. The musical entertainments which Professor Petersilea gives free to the public are of a high order and are much appreciated by all who attend them.

The work of Professor Petersilea, at the Sunday meetings is ably seconded by Mrs. Lyon—wife of M. M. Lyon, the well known secretary of the society—and by Mrs. E. D. Lunt. Both of these ladies are fine vocalists. Mr. E. D. Lunt is editor of the bright little Medium, our local paper. His heart, is in his good work.

Professor Streight, the artist, is about to leave our city for a brief stay at Mountain View, Cal., where his home is situated. He and Mrs. Streight, who is a delightful woman to meet, expect to return to us soon. We have hopes of their making this city their permanent home. Professor Streight's artistic productions win admiration from all; they are pronounced beyond criticism by art connoisseurs. These works of art have elicited the encomiums of some of the ablest art critics in the world. Professor Streight is a Spiritualist and a medium; he is always under spirit influence when he wields his brush. His coloring is exquisite. Some of his larger works have been valued at thousands of dollars. Recently one of these—"When the Mists have Cleared Away," was hung in exhibition at the Unitarian Church in Los Angeles. His landscape scenery is grand beyond description, and has won articles of high praise from competent judges of art, and from the press all over the country.

Recently this artist has been painting scenes of spiritual life shown to his clairvoyant vision. These are delicate, dainty and beautiful as are also the life readings he gives in one of his pictures, that are beautiful enough to adorn the fairest parlor in the land. These delineations in oil depict the career of the individuals for whom they are painted.

All one has to do is to send a scrap of writing or a lock of hair to the artist—with, of course, the fee of ten dollars for the picture—to secure one of these gems of art. In addition to such work, the Professor paints the life-size portraits of spirits for their mortal friends. His work in this line has been marvelous, he having been successful in securing perfect likenesses of spirits whose mortal friends had no picture of them, and in every instance his production has been recognized and verified. Such a worker should be constantly employed.

Dr. E. D. Babbitt, author of "Principles of Light and Color" has established his College in Los Angeles. His faculty is composed of men of the highest standing, all of whom are competent business men and physicians. The Doctor will surely do a grand work here. He is genial, happy, and full of the sunshine that he loves to teach about. Dr. Babbitt is so magnetic and sunny, I feel that he must be an embodiment of stored-up light and color such as he studies the principles of and applies to his healing work. Every student should read his great work. His charming wife is also a living example of the value of a cheerful and sunny disposition. Our city is enriched by their presence.

Dr. J. R. Buchanan, of San Jose, who has performed such grand work for humanity in his investigations and discoveries of the psychical and physical nature of man, is now in his eighty-fourth year but still attending to his intellectual work. In a recent letter to me, Dr. Buchanan says he feels that his time on earth is soon to close. He has just published a unique and instructive little work on Periodicity that he sells for seventy-five cents a copy. It gives many interesting data and facts concerning the law of Periodicity, and explains how it affects human lives. In this book the author tells us how we may guard against sickness, misfortune and other ills. I wish every Spiritualist would order a copy from the author as a recognition of his work and as an interesting souvenir of it for themselves.

But now I must defer all further items for another letter—this is too lengthy now. Our love to all friends.

Los Angeles, Cal. M. T. LONGLEY.

MASS CONVENTION

OF SPIRITUALISTS IN BUFFALO, N. Y., FOR THE N. S. A., UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE WOMANS' PROGRESSIVE UNION.

The two days' convention announced for the N. S. A. in this city, is one of a series throughout the country, that have been held on behalf of the work of Spiritualism. No place could have been more admirably suited for this purpose than the Spiritual Temple, corner of Prospect avenue and Jersey street. This temple is only in process of construction; that which ultimately will be the basement being now used; but already the basement room is occupied by the society here, and the kitchen and room adjoining afforded the ladies opportunity to entertain the visitors with good lunches and dinners. As everybody in the ranks of Spiritualism knows this building owes its existence to the untiring zeal of the Womans' Progressive Union, under the leadership of Mrs. Dr. Matteson, of this city, one of the foremost spiritual healers in the country.

This mass meeting was arranged for the N. S. A., under the admirable management of Mr. Frank Walker, of Hamburg, N. Y., who, with the local society above mentioned, has succeeded in drawing a large number of people from the city and surrounding country to listen to the array of speakers brought from several corners of the globe. Among them are H. D. Barrett, president N. S. A.; Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, vice-president N. S. A.; Hon. L. V. Moulton, trustee N. S. A., and president of the Michigan State Association; Mrs. Abbie E. Sheets, vice-president Michigan State Association; E. W. Sprague, missionary and organizer for the N. S. A., together with local talent, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates, now located at Rochester; Homer Altemus, of Washington, and others.

Friday's sessions were full of interest, Mr. Walker opening the meeting by stating its object, and further carrying forward the interest by introducing Mrs. Sheets. Later in the day Mr. Barrett and Mr. Moulton appeared on the scene, and in the evening Mrs. Richmond arrived from Chicago. The meetings were full of enthusiasm, and the room, well filled in the day services, was crowded in the evening.

Mrs. Richmond opened the evening session with an invocation, but being weary, was reserved for Saturday to make her regular address.

Mr. Barrett and Mr. Moulton never did better, and the tests of Mrs. Kates and Mr. Altemus were fully recognized.

At night the audience went home in a pouring rain, but Saturday morning the clerk of the weather apologized, and brought out his brightest sunshine, as much as to say: "If Mr. Walker had consulted me beforehand, I would have made the weather to suit."

Saturday morning the session was devoted to a conference, the subject being, "How best to advance the work of Spiritualism." Mr. Barrett, Mrs. Richmond, and many local celebrities took part in the discussion.

The dinner served between sessions by the ladies was most excellent. In the afternoon the addresses were by that veteran worker, Lyman C. Howe and Hon. L. V. Moulton. Mr. Howe's remarks were very much appreciated. As Mrs. Sheets outdid herself in the address of yesterday afternoon, so did Mr. Howe more than surpass himself in his address to-day. He was inspired from surroundings without and light from within and above. Mr. Moulton followed with a ringing speech, full of spicy and witty remarks, and closing with a grand appeal for the support of the work in Buffalo, which these noble women have inaugurated, and for the N. S. A.

The evening session brought to a close this notable meeting, Mrs. Richmond being the principal speaker. The occasion was one to inspire her inspirers, and we need not say more. In closing, Mr. Barrett thanked the audiences, the Womans' Progressive Union and the daily Buffalo papers for their hospitality and courtesy.

The beautiful music for the convention was furnished by Miss Blanche Turber, of Farnham, N. Y.; Mr. Altemus, of Washington, D. C.; Miss McKee and Miss Biddle, of Buffalo.

There is no more efficient worker than Mr. Frank Walker, and the financial results of the convention attest his ability to conserve the enthusiasm aroused by the speakers.

The approaching organization of a New York State Association is a source of great congratulation, and the speakers have all dwelt upon it favorably.

The meeting adjourned in the midst of congratulations, and the various speakers dispersed to their different and distant fields of labor. Buffalo is a beautiful place and will soon be the champion city in our cause unless other cities look out for their laurels.

LAKE HELEN CAMP-MEETING.

Sunday, the 14th, was another red-letter day in the records of the Spiritualists' meeting. Mr. Colby and Mr. Peck were both highly instructive. Mr. Colby answered questions, showing up the philosophy of Spiritualism in a clear manner. Mr. Peck described his "Path from Methodism to Spiritualism," and explained how revivalists hypnotized their audiences. Dr. Arthur, of Galveston, Texas, gave public tests. He appeared to be quite successful. Mrs. Twing was called home by the dangerous illness of her mother, and will not return this season. Dr. J. M. Temple gave a public test seance one day last week. He made a good impression. The camp closes March 28. A number of people will build cottages the coming season. H. A. BUDINGTON.

SPIRITUAL SONGS.

Compiled by Dr. H. V. Sweringen.

REMEMBER THE POOR.

Remember the poor, the desolate poor,
Nor leave them to wander from door to door;
Be ready and willing your comforts to share
With those who are burdened with sorrow and care.

Remember the poor, be kind to the heart
So patiently trying to bear its part;
The widow who toils by the embers that wane,
While tears from her eyelids are falling like rain.

Remember the poor, for hard is their lot
Go, visit the humble and lonely cot;
When blest is your basket, and prospered your store,
Be grateful to God, and remember the poor. —WM. EDSALL.

HEAR YOU THE ANGELS.

Hear you ever angels singing,
As around the light they shine?
Yes, I often hear them chanting,
Chanting songs of love divine.

Hear you ever in your slumbers,
Songs from those who've gone before?
Oh, how often do I hear them,
Singing on the other shore.

Do your ever feel like going,
To that sphere so bright and fair?
Oh! how often would I gladly
Go and join the loved ones there.

Let us cherish, now and ever,
Glowing hopes of joys to come,
And when earthly ties we sever,
Meet in heaven, our happy home.

Heaven's plains are just before us,
Just beyond the shores of time;
Soon we'll join the mighty chorus,
In that brighter, better clime.

MOTHER, TELL ME.

Mother, tell me of the angels,
Tell me of the joyous band;
Tell me of their blessed employment
In the glorious spirit land.
Tell me, mother, where is father,
Is he on that blissful shore,
Where he said we'd dwell forever,
And sad partings be no more?

I am weary waiting, mother,
Long ago he went away,
And he said he'd bring back brother—
O, how sweetly we would play.
Mother, when I wake at morning,
Then I think dear father's near;
But I wait till twilight's coming
Still my father is not here.

Mother, let us go and meet him
O'er the bounding billow's foam;
Yes, I know that we shall greet him
In angels' heavenly home.
There we'll part again, O, never!
But with joy no tongue can tell,
We shall live together ever
Where angelic spirits dwell.
—H. D. MUNSON.

STAND UP FOR THE TRUTH.

Stand up for the truth all your lifetime,
And never be tempted away;
Stand firm in your duty though others
May seek you to lead you astray;
Stand firm, tho' companions around you
Are yielding to error and sin;
Stand firm, and when this life is over,
A spiritual crown you will win.

Stand up for the truth without falter,
Though pathways of sin may look bright,
Yet sooner or later they'll plunge you
In misery "darkness and night;"
Stand firm, though the tempter revile you;
Stand firm, like the oak in the wood;
No matter what ill may beguile you,
Stand up for the true and the good.

Stand up for the truth! be in earnest,
Whatever you say or you do,
For this is the noblest of lessons
Our science is teaching for you.
Stand firm all your days, for hereafter
Oh, sweet are the joys you will share
Stand firm, and your heavenly Father
Will keep you forever in care.
—C. M. VON WEBER.

DO RIGHT.

"To do good is my religion."

Courage, brother, do not stumble,
Though thy path be dark as night;
There's a star to guide the humble,
Trust in God, and do the right.

Let the road be rough and dreary,
And its end far out of sight,
Foot it bravely! Strong or weary,
Trust in God, and do the right.

Simple rule, and safest guiding,
Inward peace, and inward might,
Star upon our path abiding
Trust in God, and do the right.

Some will hate thee, some will love thee,
Some will flatter, some will slight,
Cease from man, and look above thee,
Trust in God, and do the right.

JOYFULLY.

Joyfully, joyfully, onward we move,
Bound to the land of bright spirits above;
Spirits, our loved ones, in gladness say come,
Joyfully, joyfully haste we to them.
Soon will our pilgrimage end here below,
Soon to the presence of kind spirits we know;
Then, if to purity our hearts have been given,
Joyfully, joyfully, work we in heaven.

Friends we have there who have passed on before,
Waiting, they watch us approaching the shore;
Singing to cheer us, while passing along,
Joyfully, joyfully haste we to them.
Sounds of sweet music there ravish the ear,
Harps of the blessed, your strains we now hear,
Filling with harmony our spiritual dome;
Joyfully, joyfully, loved ones, we come.

Death with his arrow cannot lay us low,
'Tis but the exit to spirit-land, we'll fear not the blow;
Spiritualism hath broken the bars of the tomb,
Joyfully, joyfully will we go home.
Bright is the morn of spiritual dawn,
Death it has conquered, his scepter has gone;
Over the plains of 'Summerland' we'll roam,
Joyfully, joyfully, safely at home.

WE SHALL KNOW EACH OTHER THERE.

When we hear the music ringing,
In the bright celestial dome,
When sweet angel voices singing,
Gladly bid us welcome home,
To the land of ancient story,
Where the spirit knows no care,
In the land of light and glory,
We shall know each other there.

When the holy angels meet us,
As we go to join their band,
We shall know the friends that greet us
In the glorious spirit-land;
We shall see the same eyes shining
On us, as in days of yore;
We shall feel their dear arms twining
Fondly round us as before.

Oh, ye weary, sad, and tossed ones,
Droop not, faint not by the way;
Ye shall join the loved and lost ones
In the land of perfect day!
Harp-strings touched by angel fingers,
Murmur in my raptured ear;
Evermore their sweet song lingers
"We shall know each other there."
—T. C. O'KANE.

WELCOME HOME.

"Are they not all ministering spirits?"

In yonder world of glory,
Within its mansions fair,
A host of shining angels
Will greet our entrance there.
With song they'll bid us welcome home,
With song they'll bid us welcome home,
All heaven will ring,
As the Angels sing,
And bid us welcome home.

But ere we reach its portals,
Its untold glories see,
They wing their flight from heaven,
To bear us company.

Our Father kindly sends them,
Amid earth's countless snares
To minister unceasing,
For all God's children heirs.

They watch around our footsteps
Whatever may betide;
In all our care and sorrow,
They're ever at our side.

And when we've passed the valley
And shadow of the tomb,
They'll strike their harps celestial,
And bid us 'Welcome home.'
—TULLY.

LOVE.

The lovely spirit to her home,
The clime of cloudless beauty, flies;
No more on stormy seas to roam,
She hails her heaven in the skies:
But cheerless are those heavenly fields,
That cloudless clime no pleasure yields,
There is no bliss in bowers above,
If thou art absent, holy Love!

The cherub near the viewless throne,
Hath smote the harp with trembling hand,
And one with incense—fire hath flown,
To touch with flame the angel band;
But tuneless is the quivering string,
No melody can Gabriel bring,
Mute are its arches, when above
The harp of heaven wake not to Love.

Earth, sea and sky one language speak,
In harmony that soothes the soul;
'Tis heard when scarce the zephyrs wake,
And when on thunders, thunders roll:
That voice is heard, and tumults cease—
It whispers to the bosom peace.
Speak, thou Inspirer, from above,
And cheer our hearts, celestial Love!

TERRIBLE PROPHECY.

ONE THAT PROVED FALSE IN EVERY PARTICULAR—WORSE THAN A LIE—DANGEROUS.

To the Editor:—Allow me to protest against the publication of such utter nonsense, such rot as "A Terrible Prophecy" in your issue of February 13th. It is the publication, and by many Spiritualists, the acceptance of such rotten and crazy ideas, that tends to keep Spiritualism down in the ditch. By the time this reaches you for publication, and I want you to give it room, February will have passed, the millions in Spain, Portugal and adjacent islands will be alive, and will have to die a natural death, and untold millions will be born, and die on the same grounds. If there was any such catastrophe impending, there are tens of millions of spirits from that country on the other side who could sound notes of warning. I think the "Chief Messenger" simply exists in the disordered imagination of the gentleman from Springfield, Mo., and I hardly think our California lemon and orange growers will relax their efforts with Congress to get a 40 cent duty per box on their products, because millions of producers and competitors will be drowned during the month of February. A. D. 1897, on the Peninsula of Spain, Portugal and adjacent islands. Rot! Too rotten to be dished up as Spiritualism. Spiritualism might make itself respected, and be something, but its fool friends will not permit it to be respectable. The result is that to-day the ism is in a disgraceful condition. Read the letter of Emma Hardinge Britten in the same number. The same cry is re echoed by every true friend of it. There are to-day many eminent men and women, men and women who are advanced thinkers; who have the capacity to raise it up and show its wonderous beauties, its grandeur, its science and its agreements with all that is good and great, who cannot get anything to do, and who are casting about now for other employment, because they cannot get any engagements, while the wonder-mongers cannot get halls large enough. People flock to the latter shows for 10, 15, and 25 cents a few times, the same as they would to a negro show, and then drop out. The phenomena-hunter has now got hold of Spiritualism, and the intelligent and advanced drop out or join some liberal church. Look at the advertisements of the great dailies—all sorts of monte banks of both sexes advertise under the guise of Spiritualism, promising all sorts of impossible things, but everything that people would like, whether rational or not, till the blush of shame mantles one's cheek, and these all carry on their shameful occupation under the name of Spiritualism, and whatever odium there is connected with that sort of thing every Spiritualist has to bear, and it is no wonder that people drop away from it.

Is there no way to raise Spiritualism out this disgraceful condition? Is it not possible to do something, and say something that will command respect for it? The majority of articles in your paper would be a credit to any journal, either scientific or otherwise. Why is it not possible to exclude such damnable rot, as the article I speak of? E. BACH.

Don't be alarmed, brother, over the result of a "Terrible Prophecy." On the contrary, rejoice long and loud that it proved false—totally unreliable! You seem to squirm because it proved a failure? Supposing it had proved true, would we have had occasion to rejoice then and be glad over the ruin and suffering caused? We feel especially delighted that we published it, and that it only proved a passing shadow, a whim of some mischievous spirit and nothing to cause any apprehension of lasting danger.

Mrs. Annie Besant will arrive in New York early this month. She will remain in America six months, and visit all the largest cities, lecturing on theosophy and on some of her experiences on her journey through India, whence she is now returning.

SPIRITUALISM SCIENTIFICALLY DEMONSTRATED.

BY PROF. ROBERT HARE.

His Remarkable Researches Made in the Early Years of Spiritualism.

Directly Edited and Revised by Him, Now in Spirit-Life.

"A portable writing-desk, usually standing on the secretary in the room, was taken and placed upon the floor, a towel spread over it, and the image of a child kneeling beside it. A Yankee clock was taken from the mantel in the nursery and placed upon the floor in the middle room, a distance of twenty feet, and so carefully done that the clock was still going when discovered in its new place, though it stopped some time after. It does not appear that any of these images were seen in the process of construction, or that the clothing, which was gathered from different localities, was seen in the act of moving. When persons entered the room every thing was still, the clothing about the floor, which, upon going in again within a few minutes, were found wrought into forms. The marked rapidity of their construction, and the life-like appearance of them, seems to have been truly wonderful. During this day several others than members of the family were present. In several instances, when the rooms were closed and the doors guarded, so that no person could enter, the images were constructed. To one reading or listening to the relation of these facts, the mischief and cunning evinced will seem amusing as well as most wonderful; but to the family, who bore the annoyance and witnessed the terrifying demonstrations, it was a serious and trying affair.

"The reader will keep in mind this was on Saturday of the first week of these strange proceedings, and many persons were still believing that they must be produced by some one in the house; every member of the family therefore was subjected to the most rigid scrutiny, which makes it morally certain that no member of the household could have had any agency in the matter without being at once detected. Beside the neatness and despatch with which they were formed, the natural appearance of most of them must have required taste and skill beyond the conception of ordinary persons in the flesh. Mr. M. remained there throughout the day, Mr. W., Govenor Plant, and Captain S., a part of the day. During the day and evening various things were thrown in different parts of the house. A brick-bat, which lay on the stairs leading to the third story, was thrown violently down stairs, passing very near the head of the eldest daughter as she was descending the stairs. A fire-shovel was also thrown near her, which she first saw high above her in a position to fall upon her head. She was several times constrained to cry out from fear, so much as to cause apprehension on her account.

Coats, hats, and canes of gentlemen, who were strangers in the house, were spirited away; the only object seeming to be the gratification of mischievous desires, with the exception of a few instances. They were found sometimes in the chimney, under the bed, and in the bottom of trunks. The design seemed to be to detain the owners to witness further demonstrations. Two gentlemen from an adjoining town called, one of whom had expressed an earnest desire to witness the phenomena; but having passed several hours, and seeing nothing, they were about to leave, when the person who expressed the wish found himself minus a hat. A thorough searching followed, but no hat could be found; consequently, the gentleman decided to remain until the next day. During the evening and night, phenomena transpired sufficient to gratify his most abundant desire. Similar cases, with like results, afterward occurred.

"On Friday and Saturday, March 23rd and 24th, the disturbances increased, and became still more annoying. Loud poundings and screams were heard in different places, and on Saturday evening, between sunset and dark, Harry was passing through the dining-room, and thought himself suddenly caught up by some unseen power from the floor, and supposed that he was about to be carried off through the ceiling. He was very much frightened, and screamed so as to alarm the family, and remained in a state of great nervous excitement for two or three hours, and the effects did not wholly wear off for more than a week. At times he was in such a state as to require two men to hold him. For several days after this, he spent a portion of his time with one of the neighbors during the day; but the disturbances continued the same at the house, although he appeared to be more or less the medium as long as the phenomena continued. At one time he was thrown into a cistern of water; at another he was tied up and suspended from a tree, and several times was thrown into a state of apparent insensibility, in which he would remain from ten to fifteen minutes, and for which no human cause could be assigned.

"Somewhere about the 20th or 22d of March, Dr. P.'s attention was called to a pamphlet, (Capron and Barron's,) giving a history of the 'mysterious noises' at Rochester and Auburn. Several persons who had read the same proposed to question the agents of these disturbances in the manner there recorded, and see if they could get answers to questions. To this the doctor objected, for reasons known to himself, but which may readily be imagined by those knowing his position in life, and his general opinions of such phenomena.

"On the 26th of March Anna left Stratford, and on the 3d of April Harry also left. No manifestations took place while both were away. Harry was absent a week, and Anna three weeks; but the very day that Harry returned, the manifestations commenced with greater power than ever. Even before he arrived at the house, a paper with some mysterious characters was dropped near the front door. These characters were interpreted by a clairvoyant to read as follows:

"'Fear not when he returns; all danger is o'er.
We came, we disturbed thy house; but shall no more.
Believe us not evil or good, till we prove
Our speech to humanity, our language of love.'

"This was supposed to indicate that no further disturbance would be made; but in the course of two or three hours another paper was found in the boy's hat, in these words:

"'The good ones say that all is done,
But the wicked ones say it has just begun.'

"The 'wicked ones,' in this case, seemed to come nearer the truth than the 'good ones;' for, on the afternoon of the eighth of April, the breaking of glass commenced for the first time, by the breaking of a pane in a mysterious manner. In the evening of the same day another was broken during family prayers, some of the pieces falling inside and some outside. There were no indications of anything being thrown against it.

"From this time forward for several weeks glass was broken almost daily, until the whole number of panes broken amounted to seventy-one in the house and out-buildings. Most of them were broken by something being thrown against them; among the articles were a brush, a shoe, a poker, a fire-shovel, a candlestick, a pair of snuffers, books, and numerous other things; occasionally a stone or piece of brick, thrown from the outside.

"The mysterious visitors, whoever they were, seemed at times to be actuated by a spirit of sheer mischief in the destruction of property, particularly glass and crockery. Even the glass in the carriage-top was broken out. Pitchers of water were on two or three occasions, poured into the beds, and the pitchers and other vessels thrown about the room and broken. The damage to furniture during the whole time was nearly two hundred dollars. Sometimes there was a cessation of 'hostilities' for two or three days; but they would return with additional violence; in fact, they increased gradually in violence from the beginning to the middle of April. On the evening of that day, and during the night, they were more violent and destructive than ever before. On the night of the 13th of April, loud pounding and beating, as with some hard substance, were frequent in the room adjoining that in which Dr. P. slept; so loud and continued were they, that at 1 o'clock no person in the house had been able to sleep. Soon after, a small drawer was taken from a dressing-table, and beaten so violently against the bedstead as to break it into fragments, some of which were thrown against the windows, breaking two panes of glass. The knockings were now transferred to Mrs. P.s room. She was pinched, pricked with pins, and otherwise annoyed in a manner beyond explanation 'on any known laws of matter or mind.' Mr. W. C. was staying in the house that night. He went to the room by request, and proposed to interrogate them, as they were then doing at Rochester and other places in Western New York. Being left to act his pleasure, he queried, and was replied to as follows: 'Who are you? If a spirit, knock.' Immediately there were heard on the head of the bed distinct knocks. Q.—'Are you a good or bad spirit? If good, knock.' To this there was no answering sound. 'If a bad spirit, knock.' At once the same sounds as before were heard. Q.—'Will you spell your name if the alphabet is called?' A.—Knock. It was done; and a name was spelled out, and a communication made of a most extraordinary character, detailing the particulars of a transaction in which a portion of the family were said to have been defrauded out of a large property. As this whole communication relates to a matter which may yet come before the tribunals of our country for adjudication, I am expressly prohibited from making any extracts from this part of the journal. I regret this more, as the facts in this case form one of the most wonderful and unaccountable cases on record.

"The family concluded that, after these important disclosures were made, the disturbances would cease; but they were doomed to be disappointed. The following night no communications were made, but the throwing of articles and breaking windows, crockery, etc., were renewed with greater violence than before. Four or five panes of glass were broken in one room in the space of half an hour.

"About this time, Dr. P.'s attention was called to the fact that the demonstrations were much more violent in the presence of some persons than of others. While some were present they would cease entirely, and commence as soon as they left, with great vehemence.

"On the 17th the communications were renewed, and from that time they had frequent communications, mainly respecting the property affair. At one time they asked how they should know that this was really from the spirit it purported to be, and requested his signature; when in less than four minutes a small piece of paper, having on it an exact fac-simile of his handwriting, was seen sticking to the wall—the writing apparently done with a pencil. Dr. Phelps still perserves the original paper, with the name inked over. It was stuck to the wall by being made damp.

"It was now discovered that, in order to get the rapping, the presence of Henry was necessary. At one time a request was made by the rapping to send him to New York, and a threat that all the windows in the house would be broken, if they did not, was made; but in a few minutes after, a small piece of paper was seen to fall, apparently from the ceiling, and on it written, 'Send him not to New York—evil will befall him.' It was evident that there were two or more contending agencies engaged in the manifestations. It was not easy to define or imagine what their objects were. At times, when one was making a communication, the other would rap, seemingly to make confusion. At other times, when a communication was being made by alphabet, a paper would be dropped down, and on it written, "It is all a lie; don't believe what he says." Sometimes language the most profane, and occasionally, but rarely, obscene, would be written out in this way. Inquiry was made as to how these contradictory communications were to be accounted for, and the answer was that an opposing spirit was attempting to defeat the object of the first; that this spirit was now one of his tormentors; that both were in a state of misery, and his suffering would be mitigated if the object of the first could be accomplished, although he would never go to a state of happiness.

"Among the spirits who communicated were two who professed to be in a state of happiness, and three in a state of misery. One of the good spirits claimed to be a sister of him who made the first communication; she communicated frequently, and constantly manifested herself in the morning and evening devotions of the family, and always gave two distinct knocks at the utterance of 'Amen.' Upon inquiry as to the meaning of these two knocks, the answer was given that it was a response, after the manner of the Episcopal service, signifying that she joined in the devotions.

"Much that was communicated after the first few days was of a trifling and childish character; some, more like what would be received from street rowdies than anything else. To the question why they destroyed property, they replied, 'For fun.' It was asked of the opposing spirit what could be done to afford him relief; he answered that 'The best thing they could do would be to give him a piece of pie.' Sometimes letters would come, purporting to be from ministers of Philadelphia, giving accounts of conversions in their congregations and additions to their churches. These were addressed to the doctor, and indicated a knowledge of things in Philadelphia to an astonishing degree. Some of the letters were addressed to Mrs. Phelps, signed, or rather purporting to be signed, by departed spirits of persons who had lived in Philadelphia, and all, or nearly all, who had lived in a single square, and were the acquaintances of Mrs. Phelps, during a residence in that city, in the time of her former marriage. Sentimental notes were also addressed to the daughter. These letters and billets were frequent, amounting in all to nearly one hundred, and were all written in one hand, though purporting to come from different persons. The fact was at one time referred to, and an explanation desired, to which the following was given: 'We do not write with the hand—do not touch the pencil; we write with the will.' At one time a paper was thrown down to Mrs. Phelps, while in the parlor with a number of ladies, having written on it, with a pencil, as follows:

"'Sir: Sir Sambo's compliments, and begs the laddyes to accept as a token of esteem.'

"A lady in the family of Dr. Phelps had, in a humorous way, requested the spirits to write her a letter that she might send to a friend in Philadelphia. The spirit complied with the request by sending down the following:

"'Dear Mary: I have just time to write and tell you I am well. Give my love to Miss K. and her uncle. Also to Mrs. and Mr. D. Also to Sarah. Good-bye. H. P. DEVIL.

"The initials of the lady's name who asked for the letter were H. P.

"Papers were also thrown down, signed 'Beelzebub' and 'Sam Slick.' Sometimes names of persons whom the family had known in Philadelphia, but who had been dead several years, were signed to these papers.

"The following was in pencil, and seems to be written in the same hand as the other. It was superscribed 'E. Phelps:'

"'If you promise not to write what I told you, I will not throw anything all this week.'

"On the 28th of July, 1850, two singular letters were thrown down, addressed to Dr. Phelps. They were both in one handwriting, but were signed by two different orthodox clergymen of Philadelphia. Their interest in religious movements, and their acquaintance with the phraseology of 'revival' correspondence, are seen at a glance. 'St. Peter's,' in the second letter, is a Puseyite church.

"'Dear brother: The Lord is dealing bountifully with his chosen people. Brother Barnes admitted to the church forty-nine last Sunday, and Brother Parker thirty-four to-day. Brother Converse has had the cholera, and Brother Fairchild has grown so fleshy as scarcely to be recognized. Our friend Mr. Tarr has buried his wife. She died of consumption. E. Tarr is married. Brother Mahu, being suddenly inspired last Sunday, spoke so eloquently and so loud, and used such majestic action, as to be quite done up for a while. He broke a blood-vessel. Old Tiers has gone crazy, and is shut up in a mad-house, or, rather, a hospital. The H——s have gone into the country to spend some time. That's all the news.

"'Your faithful brother in Christ,
"'R. A.'

"'Dear Brother: The millennium truly is coming. The day of the Lord is at hand. We are adding countless numbers to the altar of the Lord. Brother A——, became inspired last Sunday to such a degree, that his soul took its flight to the regions above, and has not yet returned. The Catholic churches, St. Joseph's and St. Mary's, were burned down; St. Peter's, also—I believe that is a Catholic church. Brother Mahu was preaching from the text, 'Resist the devil,' etc., when he was suddenly overturned by an invisible power, which frightened him so that his hair turned white in five minutes.

"'Brother Barnes, to render his church more attractive, is going to have opera-singing and dancing every Sunday afternoon. Mrs. Alexander Twoer, old Mr. Tiers, Brother Fairchild, and Mrs. Somerville are going to dance. I think they will find it very lucrative employment. Jane and Martha still progress in Hebrew.

"'Your affectionate brother, M. R.'

"On Sunday, April 27th, 1851, on returning from church, the family found strange characters written on the last leaf of a writing-book, lying on the hall floor, although it was in the nursery previous to their to their going away. None of the family had any knowledge of how the book got into the hall.

ROWAN MILL TRAGEDY.

drear, the locality presenting a very forbidding appearance. This cliff is the place where Nancy Hayes met her bloody and untimely end, and from whence Noah Matheney was led to his death by the shadowy hand of Amos Molloy. The cliff is known as "Murderer's Rock."

On the north side of the Springfield turnpike, on the farm of P. H. Bowman, is a giant oak tree, which is pointed out as the one upon which Amos Molloy was hanged for a crime he did not commit. The tree and the immediate locality are regarded as being cursed, from the fact that the old oak was blasted by lightning years ago, and that within the memory of the oldest citizen no verdure has grown within a radius of 30 feet of the tree. In addition to this, two men met untimely deaths within its shadow. One, a young man, accidently killed himself while squirrel hunting; the other, a man of mature years, was thrown from his horse and his neck was broken. This tree is only a short distance from and nearly opposite the site of the old pottershop. Some distance further up the Springfield turnpike, on the farm of J. F. Wood, is an old, neglected burying ground, within whose precincts are two sunken and grass-grown graves, side by side. They are marked by limestone rocks, bearing the initials, "A. M." and "N. H." These graves are reputed to be the last resting places of the ill-starred lovers, Amos Molloy and Nancy Hays.

VERY SIGNIFICANT.

The Progressive Thinker leads. It publishes more reading matter than any other dollar Spiritualist paper on this green earth. It was the only Spiritualist paper that had enterprise enough to publish President Barrett's address before the National Convention at Washington. It covered three pages of the paper. It now proposes to send out 1,000,000 copies of the paper containing his address.

Incidents With Good Advice.

INSTRUCTIVE CASES.

TWO REMARKABLE CASES OF OBSESSION—SOMETHING FOR THE "DOCTORS" TO FIGURE ON.

To the Editor:—During the last few months the Spiritualists of this part of Oregon have had some very interesting experiences, while the same cases furnished our church friends with material to emphasize their "I told you so."

To be brief, I will simply relate facts, and permit others to draw their own conclusions.

The first case we will call that of Mrs. A. She is a widow and had rooms on the second floor of a brick structure, and lived alone. While a member of the Christian church, she still showed some inclination toward Spiritualism. She is a splended nurse, and undoubtedly possessed the organization of a healing medium. Her father, as well as herself, had some experiences in their earlier days, to prove to one acquainted with the philosophy, that both were mediumistic. Mrs. A. was poor and was obliged to work for her living. She knew that we claimed there were mediums who could heal by the laying on of hands, and she intimated her desire to be developed for that purpose.

Here a short digression: A number of years ago she kept a boardinghouse, where a certain boarder made some improper advances which she repulsed, humiliating him, for which he threatened revenge. He passed over several years after, and during the last year made himself known to Mrs. A. on several occasions through the Ouija board. At first he misrepresented to her, but later promised to be truthful and declare the old score off.

When she commenced sitting alone for development, this party pretended to be another—a friend of her father—and under promises of speedy development, if she would do his bidding, Mrs. A. put implicit confidence in what he told her. In a short time she became clairaudient, so that he spoke to her directly and regularly.

For several days he told her that if she would follow his directions, he would make a first-class healing medium of her, and then she would not be obliged to work so hard for a living; etc. After getting her under his complete control, so that she did not even have any desire to resist his instructions, he proceeded to weaken her organism by telling her to clean her house and purify her body in order to become perfectly healthy. He told her that germs of disease lurk in false teeth, and that she must throw them into the stove, and in they went, followed by her false hair, corset, and other articles. He instructed her to bathe in hot water, and then roll in blankets and sweat. This evidently to further weaken her physical powers of resistance in case she should see fit to resist.

He then controlled her hand to write a letter to several physicians, stating that she wanted a certain operation performed; and instructed her to take it to them. When she did this, the request was so ridiculous that the physicians at once pronounced her insane, and here other peculiar actions soon became known.

The authorities were notified, and arrangements were being made for an examination, preparatory to committing her to the asylum. We learned of this, and at once went to the woman, and believing it to be a clear case of obsession or improper control, explained it to her on that basis and urged her to pay no further attention to his instructions. At this point she remarked that she had not heard him speak a word since we had entered the room, while he had been conversing and giving directions during the entire day. This was used to reinforce our argument that he was deceiving her, and that he was afraid to make any statement for fear of being questioned, and his identity revealed.

This seemed to break his control, and for the first time for two days and nights she felt in her normal condition. When she realized the terrible fact that she had been imposed upon and thus abused by that human brute, it was pitiful to see how she grasped the situation. A good, intelligent woman, being influenced to do what she had done, was too much for her; and she jumped up from her chair, saying she would not remain there another night. And she kept her word. During the two or three days preceding this, she was told to give away certain pieces of her household goods, and realizing that she get get no work now, after being "crazy," she concluded to go to her brother's place in Southern Oregon. She remained with us for two weeks after being released from the control—after the devil had been cast out—and was just as normal and rational as ever. Several times she heard him speak to her during the first few days, but we instructed her to pay no attention to anything he said, and with the assistance of some of our spirit friends who promised to aid her, she was free from his power.

It would require too much space to give the case in full, so we have simply stated the principal points. All the while these things were being done, the woman was perfectly conscious of everything taking place, but he had her under such complete hypnotic control, that she had no desire to resist.

CASE NUMBER TWO.

Case number two will be known as Mr. B. He expressed a willingness to investigate Spiritualism, and had a very satisfactory sitting with an independent slate-writer, where the slates were placed on the table by himself, and his own hands placed on them. Under these satisfactory and conclusive conditions, he received communications from several of his deceased relatives—the medium and Mr. B. being perfect strangers to each other. During the sitting, the medium told Mr. B. that he believed he (Mr. B.) possessed the qualities for a slate-writer himself. This encouraged Mr. B. to sit alone for development. In a short time he was controlled, and taken through certain muscular contortions with which all Spiritualists are familiar. This was done for the purpose of healing him of kidney and lung trouble. In order to secure the desired results in their treatment, his controls had to take him through this movement. Instead of treating him at certain stated times, and he remaining in his room at those times, he was controlled promiscuously, and in any place he might happen to be.

The first act to cast doubts upon his sanity was when he attended religious services at the church of which he was a member, and when the preacher had finished, Mr. B. arose and made some remarks which would be perfectly comprehensible and correct in the estimation of a Spiritualist, but which were considerably at variance with the preacher's orthodox sermon. After he had offered his criticism, he quietly resumed his seat, but not until he had greatly embarrassed and surprised the relatives and brethren, and amused the boys and unbelievers. He afterward told us that he was instructed, clairaudiently, to do this, and apparently did not have the power the resist.

Shortly after this he went to Salem to attend the State Fair, and while there his controls treated him as before, and with the same twitching and jerking external results. His friends with whom he was stopping, mistaking it for some nervous disorder, called in the physicians, and being ignorant of the cause, proceeded to dose him with chloroform and ipecac. The first dose not having the desired effect, they gave him a larger one, until his nervous system was weakened beyond his own control, and the spirit controls injudiciously took charge of it and proceeded to lecture in a manner beyond Mr. B.s ability while in the normal condition. He was conscious of all that was taking place, but was unable or had not the necessary desire, to stop it. Of course, under those circumstances, he was pronounced insane and taken to the asylum. For three days and nights the over-zealous spirit controls continued to use his vocal apparatus in discoursing upon various subjects. Finally the stunning effects of the chloroform and ipecac wore off, and his nervous system regained its equilibrium to such an extent that he could control it, and prevent their further using it against his will. He gradually recovered, and in three weeks returned home, wiser, but with the stamp of insanity upon him in the eyes of people who were ignorant of the spiritualistic philosophy. Under the continued treatment from the spirit side of life, he has gained about twenty pounds since his return, and is in better health than for a number of years.

My reason for citing these two cases which have come under my personal observation, is to call attention to the danger in promiscuous development for mediumship. Here were two cases which, if properly directed by experienced Spiritualists, would have been a credit to the cause instead of a discredit as viewed by the world at large. If these two persons could have sat in a regular circle, and been in the constant company of persons acquainted with the philosophy involved, there would have been no danger, but as it was, one was sent to the asylum, and the other came very near it.

The lesson I would draw it this: Never sit alone, if there is the least probability of the controls overcoming one's judgment. Even though their intentions may be good, as in Mr. B.'s case, yet their experience has been insufficient with regard to the management of mediums, and their operations may become very injudicious. Never permit a control to cause you you to do that which your judgment cannot sanction, no matter under what promise it is given. Only evil-designing controls are liable to resort to such measures.

These cases call to mind the thought that undoubtedly, there are many others in the asylums, who are simply the victims of control. I could cite another case, where during her first confinement, a young woman was given chloroform and other treatment which weakened her system to such an extent that a degraded spirit took control of her organism, and the language he made that previously moral girl use, was deplorable. Under these conditions, she was committed to the asylum, where she is at present, and at last reports was, at times, able to control her own body, and of course at those times she was considered "rational" by the authorities.

A long talk with the physician who treated Mr.B. while he was at the asylum, revealed the fact that there are a great many committed who at times are rational as ever, and at other times seem to be somebody else—pure cases of obsession. This visit also revealed the fact that the authorities of the Oregon Insane Asylum know nothing of Spiritualism as a philosophy—a condition to be deplored when we realize what could be done for the unfortunate inmates, if the causes of their trouble were properly understood, and the correct treatment applied.

Let all Spiritualists be sure to caution persons who are beginning their investigation by sitting alone, to be very careful—and to make a regular practice of reporting, so that those of experience may know what is taking place and advise accordingly. And further, let us make a practice of looking into all cases of so-called "insanity" before they are sent to the asylum; perchance it may be a case like these I have cited. Get the promise of the county judge—as we did here—to not commit a person to the insane asylum until we had an opportunity to investigate the matter. In this manner we may be able to rescue many an unfortunate person from the terrible environment of asylum, and prevent many a heartache after recovery, when they shall have returned home, with the brand of insanity upon them.

DR. SCHERMERHORN AT AKRON, OHIO.

To the Editor:—Last September "The First Spiritual and Religious Association of Akron engaged the service of Dr. F. Schermerhorn as lecturer and test medium for the ensuing year.

The best proof of the efficiency of the work done is shown by the large audiences drawn there every Sunday evening, often testing the seating capacity of the hall, which is about four hundred, to its utmost. These audiences are composed mainly of progressive thinking people, who in many cases, after being fully convinced, through the tests of the truths of our philosophy as taught from evening to evening, have come boldly out and helped us in every way—not forgetting the financial part, and the showing that by a proper combination of the philosophical and phenomenal you can draw large audiences, build up a good society and command the respect and attention of the thinking people.

The liberal, and in fact nearly all churches, at the present day are so honey-combed with our philosophy that unless we have some proof to offer in substantiation of what we teach, people will go where they can sit in velvet pews, look through stained-glass windows, and listen to fine music in preference to coming out to our lectures which are usually given in some lodge room, and generally up two flights of stairs. A good education, a pure inspiration and a lofty purpose, is what all mediums, inspirational as well as phenomenal, should strife for.

Let us keep jealousy from our midst, raise the standard of our rostrum work, and encourage good true mediumship of every phase.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

HOW THE GOOD SPIRITS CAME TO TWO CHILDREN.

The same day I came into expression, three little baby girls came fluttering into the home of my neighbor. All were born the same hour and nearly the same moment that I was born. Two of the three only lingered long enough to register; and then took their departure to that land of sunshine and flowers, where perennial spring abounds and balmy zephyrs fill the fragrant air, for God called them; but the other lived nine years and she and I were inseparable friends and playmates. Her parents were Catholics, while mine were Methodist. She too could hold communion with the spirits of departed friends, and so we often went together alone by ourselves and held a seance, although neither of us understood what we were doing, or that we were following the example of the disciples of old, who gathered into a little upper room in Jerusalem and waited ten days for the descent of the spirit (Holy Ghost, as they were pleased to call it) and so far as we have any record, without sleep, food or drink, and at the end of the ten days the windows of Heaven were opened and the spirit of God was poured out upon them till there was not room to receive it. And although they were mostly uneducated Galilee fishermen, they spoke with unknown tongues (a language they had never learned); some discerned spirits (or saw them), others healed the sick by laying on their hands, as an army of magnetic healing mediums are doing to-day, while some even cast out devils (relieved obsession). They created such a stir, that they were accused of drunkenness; but Peter explained how it would be impossible for them to be drunk, for the wine they drank those days would not make them drunk even though they began drinking in the morning and drank all day, and it was then very early in the morning. Hence the Bible rendering, "they that are drunken are drunken in the night."

But we were only one more of the many examples of "History repeating itself." But when her priest heard of her divine gift, he had her mother do penance for both herself and child. So you see Sadie never dare tell her mother what she saw and heard.

But one day she fell ill with scarlet fever. An angel band with the chariot of the King halted at her bedside, and bore her willing spirit to that land of sunshine, to which the other two baby girls had been borne. That was indeed a sad day for me, for she, and she alone could understand me when I talked of the dear happy children from the eternal shore who came to me.

For a long time I did not visit the old haunt made sacred to us by the presence of angels, where we used to talk with and of them when she was with me; but one day a longing to once more visit the old sacred spot took possession of me. Alone I wended my way to the never-to-be-forgotten resort and alone I sat down, with my head upon my knees as of old.

But to my amazement, the first thing I saw, was my little friend Sadie. For the moment I was deluded to believe her still in the flesh, so natural she looked; and I cried out with joy at the pleasure of seeing her, and with delight I stretched forth my arms to clasp her dear form to my heart. But, alas, I only embraced the empty air. Then she told me of Heaven (or her new home), and said she: "Why, if you will believe me, there is not a priest there, but we all do as we like. I have my dolls, my books, and now I am learning to sing. I did not have to go among strangers, but the children who used to meet us here are my companions still."

As she spoke, the dear familiar forms came trooping in. I never shall forget that hour, for I forgot all about material things, and I never knew when the shades of night spread her mantle over the silent face of nature, for I was in an enchanted state till the clock in the tower chimed out the hour of 9. Then in a bewildered, dazed condition, I arose and saw all about me was darkness.

I hastened home as fast as my limbs would carry me, to find my family greatly agitated by my absence. When on inquiring they learned I had again been indulging in my senseless dreaming, I was given a sound reprimanding and sent to bed.

A long time I lay awake sobbing, till my mother came to me inquiring the trouble, so I told her all. She said: "I am afraid I shall be obliged to send my little girl away to an institution for medical treatment, for these spells are growing more frequent."

Then I told her how Sadie while here could do the things I did, and while here to-day wanted me to tell her mother she was there and all she said; but when my mother carried the message to Sadie's mother, the poor woman held up her hands in holy horror, and crossed herself and prayed to the Virgin Mary to protect her from such a child as I, for surely I had a devil.

But that was not all, for Sadie often come to her mother in her dreams, until the poor woman was really afraid to go to sleep alone. But could she only have known, how the dear angels hover ever near our couches while we sleep, and "kiss down our eyelids in prayer," and how they ever walk silently by our sides and share our sorrows as well as our joys, what a different shading life would have presented to her, and how infinitely happy she would have been.

But long ere this she has learned her lesson, for she has dropped the mantle of clay and donned a more beautiful garment of immortality, for she has joined the innumerable host of that eternal shore, in a new and higher expression of life.

Of all those who lived and associated with me in those days, I alone am left to finish up my work. But I often get glimpses of them in these days. Sadie often comes to me now. She tells me she is now a guide. And thus the scriptures are brought to pass: "He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways; they shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone."

Should any of my little readers be the holy recipient of the divine gift of mediumship, and can in any way hold communion with departed spirits, I pray you, guard well that gift, and do not allow any one to rob you of your birthright, or stint its growth; but cultivate it and use it for the betterment and upbuilding of humanity, and great will be your reward. If you have five talents, doubit them; but if you only possess the one talent, double that. When much is given much is required; but if we only have one talent, little is required—but we are bound to render that up in interest. And now good bye again for a time. Lovingly yours,

FIFTEEN CENTS!

PROF. BARRETT'S ADDRESS.

Other Subjects Treated of Especial Interest.

The Progressive Thinker is to be sent three months for 15 cents to all New subscribers.

Spiritualists, keep posted in current Spiritual events.

Why remain in ignorance? Why don't you keep posted in regard to the great Spiritualistic movement? Prof. Barrett delivered an address before the National Association of Spiritualists. It was an important one, and should be read by every Spiritualist in this broad land. We have had his address (which covers three pages of The Progressive Thinker) and five other important lectures and articles embodied in one paper, which we propose to send forth to illuminate the minds of those who have not had an opportunity to read them.

The first page of this paper contains helect ure by Col. Ingersoll, given in a Chicago pulpit. It scintillates throughout.

The second page contains a highly interesting lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on the "Dwellings of the Dead."

The third page has a splendid article on "Science versus Theology," in review of Andrew D. White's two superb volumes.

The fourth page has another excellent lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on "Spiritual Unfoldment."

The fifth page is very suggestive throughout, and is devoted to the "Hindoo Teachers—They Will Try to Capture the United States."

On the sixth page commences Prof. Barrett's admirable address, occupying three pages.

We will also, in connection with this paper, send out another equally as valuable. The first page contains an excellent lecture by Virchand R. Gandhi, a learned Hindoo. The remaining seven pages contain the wonderfully thrilling narrative (founded on facts) entitled, "The Night the Light Went Out," exhibiting many of the inside workings of the Catholic Church. Besides the address by Mr. Ghandi and the remarkable narrative, "The Night the Light Went Out," the first page has an excellent communication obtained through Ouija. The second page has a startling statement in reference to the "Romish Octopus—It Is Winding Its Poisonous Coils Around Washington." The poem on the same page, "The Sad Picture of a Wrecked Human Life," is wonderfully suggestive. The third page has a striking illustration showing how the Romish Church treats heretics. This page and the fourth also have a continuation of the "Romish Octopus." The fifth page has that remarkable poem, "St. Peter At the Gate." Every freethinker should read it. It is full of excellent "points." It also contains interesting facts in reference to the Romish Church and offices. The sixth, seventh and eighth pages have the following: "Monasteries and Convents—Where Those Alive Are Entombed." "Rider Haggard and the Immuring of Nuns." This paper, alone is well worth the price of a year's subscription.

Every Spiritualist in this broad land should have these two papers. Our regular subscribers have already read their contents. For Fifteen cents we will send the Progressive Thinker for three months to all New trial subscribers and also send these two valuable papers.

Bear in mind that by New subscriber we mean one who has not been on our list for at least three months. Those of our present subscribers who wish to buy these two papers can have them both now for five cents. All of our regular subscribers have read their contents.

Send The Progressive Thinker three months to some friend, and thus get him interested in the cause. Stamps taken on small orders.

We sincerely hope that no Spiritualist will be dishonest enough, or so dishonorable, as to take advantage of this offer, by continuing his paper when the time expires, in the name of some member of his family (or some one else) in order to get the benefit of this 15 cent offer, on which the publisher does not make a cent.

VERILY, WHAT NEXT?

Under the head of "A New Programme," we announced a radical new departure from the general routine of work assumed by the average Spiritualist paper. We do not follow old established usages unless we are thoroughly convinced that they are the best, which is very rarely the case. We established the original dollar Spiritualist paper, and introduced a new era in the line of Spiritualistic journalism. Others have followed after us, but in all candor the only thing in which they have equalled us, is in the price of the paper—one dollar.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker on the following terms:

The Encyclopaedia of Death and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. The Next World Interviewed at 35 cts. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	$ .45
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	.45
The Next World Interviewed	.35
Total	$1.25

NO. OF PAGES IN EACH BOOK.

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	400
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	400
The Next World Interviewed	250

Each of these books is neatly and substantially bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and as prices go, are well worth one dollar per volume.

Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker.

Remember, please, that in order to obtain these three books for $1.25, you must send along a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker; the paper one year, and the three books costing $2.25. It is the subscription to the paper that enables us to send you these three books at cost.

Dr. and Mrs. Aspinwall, of the First Spiritualist Society, and Mrs. E. Braun, of the First Progressive Spiritual Church, have secured the Unitarian Church, corner of 8th and Mary Place, Minneapolis, Minn., and will unite in holding services on the 49th anniversary of Modern Spiritualism. The following prominent speakers and workers will assist March 28th and April 4th; Mrs. Lepper, Mrs. Tryon, Mrs. Barton, Mrs. Lowell, Mr. Smith and Rev. Mr. Simmons and Rev. Mr. Gibbons have been invited and it is expected will also assist. Mr. Miller and Dr. Aspinwall will act as chairman.

Thomas Lees writes: "The first of 'The Angell Prize Contests' in the City of Cleveland, O., will take place on Sunday evening April 4th, by ten of the most talented members of the Children's Progressive Lyceum of that city, selected from the young folks 'Band of Mercy.' The prize is a silver medal, issued by the National Humane Association. This Contest will be a fitting supplement to the anniversary exercises to be held on Sunday 28th, in Army and Navy Hall."

Frank T. Ripley can be engaged for the Sundays of April and May. Address all letters to him at 717 Huron street, Port Huron, Mich.

Mrs. Lora Holton would like an engagement as pianist and musical director at some of the camps the coming season. Terms reasonable. Address her at 508, 44th Place, Chicago, Ill.

J. W. Dennis of Buffalo writes that full preparations are under way for a camp to be organized and held in July and August, 1897, on or near Oneida Lake, N. Y.

John W. Wray writes from Fort Worth, Texas: "Mrs. Jennie Hagan Jackson has been lecturing for the First Spiritual Society for the months of January, February and March, and will continue her engagement to May 1, at which time she goes to St. Louis to fill an engagement during the month of May. Mrs. Jackson's lectures have been of a very high order, many of them upon difficult, abstruse and scientific subjects. Her audiences have been large, intellectual and exceedingly appreciative. She has been treated with great deference by the ministry. Her splendid character, her personal worth and her superior accomplishments have popularized Spiritualism in this vicinity and greatly endeared her to the people."

R. N. Wilcox writes: "We are preparing for an anniversary, in a small way, to be held at the Free Temple, Avery, O., March 28. Our lyceum will have the supervision. We shall have a program that will last the entire day."

Charles Howell, secretary, writes as follows of a grand celebration of the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, to be held at Grand Rapids, Mich., March 27th and 28th: "Through the valued Progressive Thinker, that is taken so extensively in Michigan, we desire to extend a cordial invitation to all Spiritualists and truth-seekers to come and help us celebrate the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, for we are expecting to have a 'real 'pentecostal' time. All who come will receive free entertainment. The services will be held in the Lincoln club rooms, over 66 Pearl street, commencing at 2 p. m. of March 27, and continue until Sunday night. The committee have arranged for good speakers and mediums."

Dr. Noyes writes from Springfield, Mo.: "Mrs. Noyes and I arrived here Sunday, February 21, and filled the rostrum for the Hovey Spiritual Society, as their speaker and medium, Mrs. Josie Folsom, had sprained her ankle and could not be present. The Spiritualists here are divided, calling themselves the North and South Side Spiritualists, and as the Hovey Society is the only one conducting public meetings, it is doing a great work for the cause. Some of the Spiritualists asked us to conduct meetings on the South Side for a while, and we complied with the request. Mrs. Noyes fed the hungry souls with messages from their loved ones, and all were fully recognized. Our second meeting was a larger attendance than ever. Springfield is a fine opening for a medium with plenty of money. We leave here for St. Louis, Mo."

G. H. Elliott writes from Edgewood, Iowa: "Dr. P. J. Barrington and wife have been with us for the last three weeks, giving us a series of parlor meetings and developing circles that have been very interesting and profitable to us. The Doctor is an old pioneer in the work, gives able instructions and makes his positions clear from a scientific and philosophical standpoint. Mrs. B. speaks under inspiration and trance, and presents the philosophy of Spiritualism in its most spiritual and ennobling phases. Several new mediums are fairly started as a result of these meetings, and give promise of good work in the future. Dr. and Mrs. B. may be addressed at the present at Winthrop, Iowa."

K. writes from Washington, D. C.: "There is quite a revival in Spiritualism going on at the present time in Washington, D. C. The Rev. Mr. Wiggin, of Salem, Mass., draws a great audience every Sunday morning and night. He is the most wonderful medium that ever appeared on any platform, and I hope his labors will bring success. I am sorry to state, however, that Spiritualism was conducted during the last five months more of a business and competition, than religion or science, inasmuch as five meetings were advertised simultaneously to be held Sunday nights, within the radius of three squares, and consequently neither of them was very successful."

Mrs. A. Packard, secretary, writes: "We have a little society started here which we call the First Spiritual Society of Centralia, Ill., and are chartered under the N. S. A. We feel it is indeed true here that 'the harvest is great and the laborers are few;' but through perseverance on our part and the aid of our angel friends and any mediums we may be fortunate enough to have with us, we hope to be able to build up a flourishing society and do a good work. We depend on what we can read for instruction, but would like a good speaker and test medium. We are very poor, but would be glad to correspond with any good medium coming this way, who would be willing for a very small fee to help a struggling society on to success. We will entertain them while with us. Each number of your paper seems better than the last while improvement hardly seems possible. How can a true Spiritualist get along without it? May it soon be read by one million Spiritualists and thinkers!"

Mrs. N. L. Pierce wishes to inform her friends and patrons that she has returned from her southern trip and has located at 115 So. Paulina street, where she will hold circles every Tuesday and Friday evening, and give readings daily.

Dr. Adah Sheehan writes: "I am engaged upon my third month's work for the Philosophical Society of Lima, Ohio, for the present season. The Kansas City Society being unable to carry out its contracts for the season, left me with March upon my hands. The Lima Society, however, immediately engaged the month. It has a splendid society, well organized, and officered by people who do not know the word fail. The 49th Anniversary will be celebrated on Sunday, the 28th, and extensive preparations are being made by the officers and members of the Ladies' Aid which is composed of as efficient workers as I have ever met at any place. A Lyceum was organized last Sunday with twenty children to begin with, and all in all the Spiritualists of Lima are away above the average as a working force. I have the months of April and May open and would like to hear from societies. I am open for camp-meeting dates and the season of 1897 and 1898. Address Dr. Adah Sheehan, Elsinor Gate and Russel St, Cincinnati, Ohio.

G. W. Eichelberger writes: "The Anniversary exercises to be given by the First Spiritualist Society of Chicago at the Masonic Home Temple, 3120 Forest avenue on Sunday the 28th inst, bids fair to be of a very imposing and interesting nature. Services are to commence at 1 p. m. Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, pastor of the Church of the Soul of this city, will deliver the opening inspirational address, closing with a christening ceremony, which is to be one of most interesting features of the day's services. Other speakers and mediums will follow, interspersed with a program of recitations and good music, after which Mrs. Ada Foye, pastor of this society, will give one of her test seances for messages and communications from spirit friends, which all who have had the pleasure of hearing her pronounce the best proof of spirit return given by any medium in the world to-day. A supper will be given by the ladies of the society in the banquet hall of the Temple, from 4:30 to 8 p. m., after which the regular Sunday evening services will be given. Mrs. Foye will speak closing with tests and manifestations of the spirit."

C. T. S. C. writes from Scotts, Mich: "We have had a real feast for over a week. Dr. A. B. Spinney of Reed City, Mich., lectured upon medical subjects, temperance, religion and marriage. His private lectures to women and men were very instructive, and to the young, were warnings that would help to change the current of their lives, if on a low animal plane, to one higher, where the spiritual could unfold and they be better fitted for life's duties. Dr. Spinney is engaged in a great work, and I would urge the public to hear him as his clear cut common sense lectures are worth going many miles to hear. He has done more to harmonize and wake up the people of Scotts, than any one speaker we have had, by the reason of his inexhaustible fund of general information on a variety of subjects."

The late meeting held here at Canton, Ohio, was a great success. E. R. Kidd writes: "Brother Barrett's address was both fluent and eloquent, and filled with spiritual truths. After speaking for fully an hour, and holding his audience spellbound, he gave away and was followed by Brother Moulton, who delivered an address that was both scientific and grand. Miss Maggie Gaule was then introduced as the medium of the day, and after a few appropriate remarks, she proceeded to give tests, all of which were recognized by some one in the audience. In the evening, long before 7:30, every foot of space in the large hall was occupied, and hundreds of anxious and disappointed people were upon the outside of the building unable to gain an admission. It was estimated by some of those on the outside that fully 800 people were compelled to return to their homes, being unable to get within a good hearing distance of the speakers. The evening services were grand, the people who were fortunate enough to get seats well pleased, and the meetings as a whole were a grand success. Brothers Barrett and Moulton left on an early train this morning for Buffalo, N. Y., to fill an engagement there to-day. Miss Maggie Gaule and Brother Taylor are here to-day, but will leave for Columbus either this evening or Saturday morning."

Ella G. Magoon writes from Dallas, Texas: "After a few days, most pleasantly passed with the Spiritualist friends in the quaint little town of Marshall, Tex., we resumed our onward route to Dallas, where we are pleasantly ensconced in the home of Mr. Watkins, one of Texas' foremost of veteran workers in the cause. We have found many whole hearted friends, and staunch souls in the grand old 'Lone Star' State, with its swelling, rich farm lands, and wide green prairies. There are brains as fertile as the rich soil is productive, and hearts big as the vast landscape spread before us. There is room for workers, and a demand for brains, and honest mediums and speakers will meet a fervent handclasp from the Texan brother, wherever they may select their vineyard."

The First Society of Spiritual Unity that meets at 490 Washington Boulevard, corner of Ogden avenue, in Washington Hall, will celebrate the forty-ninth anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, March 28, 1897. There will be three services as usual, in addition Mrs. Lyman will be ably assisted by talented

"Let us have organization for business—not for propaganda. Let the Spirit of the universe attend to its business. Let each one of us do his own." That is the sentiment of Mr. Grumbine. Col. Ingersoll has also wanted the "Spirit of the universe" to attend to its business and make health catching in the same sense that disease is. Up to date, the "Spirit of the universe" has done nothing of the kind. On the contrary it appears to favor the deadly epidemic in India.

Dr. J. M. Peebles was enthusiastically received at Melbourne, Australia. He made an address there to a large audience. He is the most stirring one among the aged veterans of our cause. He has no notion of giving up his physical body until he shall have reached the century mark.

"The difficulty which confronts many investigators of Spiritualism is the contradictory communications received through different mediums," says an Australian editor. Right, brother. Charles Dawbarn, the California philosopher, will have something of special significance to say on that point at an early day in The Progressive Thinker.

Jas. M. Wade, of England, has gotten out a new bible. The more the better. Each new one does a modicum of good, perhaps, and is harmless otherwise, as a sulphurous hell is played out.

A knowledge of life beyond death is especially important to all except those who wish to go it blindly.

While Dr. Peebles was in Melbourne, Australia, the Lyceum welcomed him warmly. In response the Doctor expressed his delight not only with the address and its kindly sentiments but to see the bright faces of the children and to sense the kindly feeling that prevailed. The Lyceum was a copy of a similar school seen in the spirit world by Andrew Jackson Davis, the spiritual seer, who actualized it here. He urged upon parents the importance of Lyceum education, illustrating it with the story of an Italian artist who taking for his model a beautiful innocent boy as a representation of Heaven, had forty years later inadvertently taken the same model (who had in the meantime degenerated through a vicious ill-directed life) as a representation of Hell. The Doctor expressed his strong sympathy with the Lyceum and his intention to work with it whilst here.

Moses Hull declares that "God is a spirit, and spirit is our real self. Spirit is above all and yet I am sorry to say our spirit is often below and subordinated to the body, when we give place to lusts of the flesh, such as drinking, smoking and other injurious obnormal and sinful habits. In such cases we make the spirit subservient to the body."

J. C. F. Grumbine has weighed the National Association in the scales of the Banner of Light and found it wanting. But the question will be asked, does he weigh correctly? and the end is not yet.

Moses Hull's genial countenance graces a late Banner of Light. He seems to be looking, as usual, for the main chance to hit a superstitious old theology.

Through the mediumship of P. L. O. Keeler a pair of spectacles was brought eight squares away and placed between two slates. Verily who can measure the power of the advanced spirits.

W. J. Colville thinks that the "true functions of religion may certainly include all attempts to demonstrate the immortality of man, and the power of spirit over matter."

J. C. F. Grumbine calls the National Association an "ecclesiastical syndicate." He is evidently seeking for a "scalp" somewhere. But supposing he gets "scalped" himself, what next?

Moses Hull says "the Bible mediums gave manifestations which resemble those we receive to-day. We find those mediums fully as liable to mistakes and frauds, as our mediums are now." And yet the Bible is "holy."

At Melbourne, Australia, the Lyceum having announced a public welcome to Dr. Peebles for Monday evening, January 25th, the members and friends assembled in full force, so that by 8 p. m. every seat was occupied, and the decorations of flowers, flags and words of welcome together with the pretty dresses and happy faces of the children produced a very pleasant effect. Several recitations and songs which were given by children and adults were greeted with well deserved applause. All of which made the pilgrim very happy.

"Memory is immortal, and unselfish friendship never dies." That is what Dr. Peebles said in response to words of welcome at Melbourne, Australia. Mr. Terry considered that the welcome was particularly appropriate from the fact that Dr. Peebles had on the occasion of his first visit been largely instrumental in the growth and expansion of that particular Lyceum. When it was in its infancy, numbering only about thirty members, he and Dr. Dunn had joined in the work so that in comparatively short time there was a full Lyceum of twelve groups of 144 members.

Geo. A. Fuller says that he is ashamed to recognize the great body of Spiritualits that are looking into the heavens to see some development. "Look," he says, "within yourselves, and then you will find a Spiritualism that is true. There are higher things than outside manifestation. Let us progress, we are not obliged to study in the alphabet class."

J. C. F. Grumbine, a bright exponent of our cause, thinks the National Association exceeds its legitimate sphere "when it enters the field as an exponent of Spiritualism."

VISIONS AND PRESENTIMENTS. OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

In the Revista Espiritista de la Habana we find a translation from the interesting memoirs of Prince Meschtschensky, now in course of publication in the Grazdanin Gazette, of which the Prince is editor-in-chief. Describing the aristocratic society in St. Petersburg during the closing years of the reign of the Emperor Nicholas; that is to say at the time of the Crimean War, the writer states that in each saloon in which the upper classes of that capital used to assemble, the conversation turned chiefly upon visions, presentiments and apparitions of Russian officers who had been slain in the campaign, and who came to their friends and relations to announce when, where and how they had died.

A BILLIARD CUE.

The Prince mentions that a young lady, Nadejda N——, belonging to an aristocratic family, and an ardent Spiritualist, used to hold frequent sittings in her father's house; and obtained answers by means of a billiard-cue, one end of which moved automatically. In reply to a question, upon one occasion, the cue moved towards a book case, containing some volumes in Russian and French. Arrived there, it rose abruptly in the air, pointed to a volume, which the young lady was impressed to take down and lay open on the table. Once there, it turned over the leaves, and indicated the words of the reply, which were carefully noted down. At first they were not clearly understood, but very soon they were read off with the utmost exactitude.

ABOUT THE WAR.

One day, inquiries were made concerning the war and more especially with respect to its result. The billiard-cue made various horizontal movements to the right and left, then sprang out of the hand of the young lady, moved of its own accord towards the portrait of the Emperor, and was shattered into a thousand pieces. A few days afterwards the Czar breathed his last.

EMMA CALVE.

The same Review mentions the present made to Emma Calve, the celebrated vocalist, who is also an enthusiastic student of psychic science, by the Queen of England, after singing before her, in 1893. It consisted of a brilliant coronet of brilliants and rubies, and in presenting it, Her Majesty said:—"My friend; we have known each other upon another planet, before meeting upon this."

MOST IMPORTANT SERVICE.

The October number of the Revista de Estudios Psicologices (Barcelona) contains a portrait and brief memoir of its editor, Viscount de Torres-Solanot, a gentleman who has rendered most important services to the cause of Spiritualism in Spain. Ever since the year 1862, when he first became convinced of the glorious truth, he has been indefatigable in promoting its dissemination. He has successively edited El Progreso Espiritista of Zaragoza, El Criterio Espiritista in Madrid, the Iris de Paz in Huesca, and Un Periodico Mas at Zaragoza; besides publishing various works and pamphlets on Spiritualism.

SOME OF HER BEST POETS.

Nowhere is literature becoming more imbued with our sublime science and philosophy than in Spain. Some of her best poets are Spiritualists; and we observe in the periodical under notice, a review of a clever work of fiction under the title of "Blessed are the Demented," by Senor Miguel Gemino Eito. It is based entirely upon Spiritualism, and is described as a story of singular ability. It is issued from the office of La Revelacion, at Alicante; and the same publisher announces the early appearance of a literary study, to be entitled The Spiritualistic Theatre. The Spanish drama was born inside the walls of a church; and it would be quite in accordance with the fitness of things, that this form of literature should be purified and elevated by Spiritualism, and possibly reinstated in its old home in ecclesiastical structures; for the highest controls are extremely emphatic, and completely unanimous in predicting the speedy downfall of the old religions, as the result of the desertion of the different churches by the laity, and in prognosticating that, in the early part of the next century, innumerable pulpits will be occupied by inspirational and impressional mediums.

STRANGE SIGHTS AND SOUNDS.

Of a truth the air is filled with strange sights and sounds, and those who, on special occasions, see and hear more than is sensed by the ordinary matter-of-fact mind may be thankful for a strong body-guard of experienced and intelligent spirits, who protect them from exercising their mediumistic faculties too freely.

AMID WOODS AND HILLS.

Feeling greatly in need of a holiday, I, in company with friends, journeyed to North Wales, where amid woods and hills, and partly surrounded by the refreshing sea, I found a restful calm and easeful mind. After a long ramble, I felt much fatigued, but kept the matter to myself, fearing to become a hindrance to the others. A faintness then came over me, struggle as I would, and I was just about to make known the exhaustion I suffered, when suddenly I commenced to shiver, as if from strange influences. This lasted but a moment, and there at my side was my guide, "Rupert," and with him a spirit whom we call "Ariel." After this, walking became easy and pleasant. The change in my deportment was so marked that my companions at once concluded that help had been given me. We reached our hotel at last, and after a slight repast I retired to rest.

STRANGE CREATURES.

I must have slept a deep sleep of two or three hours' duration, when I was quickly and quietly awakened. It seemed as though a gentle hand had been placed upon my forehead to arouse me. I rubbed my eyes and looked about the room, and although I had put out my light upon retiring, yet the room was lit up with a strange, soft light, sufficient for me to see who was present. I must confess that my first feeling was one of fear, for the beings who were walking at the opposite side of my chamber were the strangest creatures I had ever beheld. It instantly flashed upon my mind that these midnight intruders were of the 'missing-link' race, which had been so vainly sought by anthropologists. They appeared too large in stature for a species of ape, and yet they were covered with a skin that was brown and hairy.

When I perceived these

WILD AND UNCANNY CREATURES

in such close proximity, I own to a quake or two. But then I saw, standing on either side of me, "Rupert" and "Ariel," and I heard a whisper that if I were not braver I should never be able to learn anything concerning the strange variety of the human family before me, I heard 'Rupert' assuring me that I was perfectly safe. A test of the truth of his words was immediately forthcoming. One of the forbidding-looking spirits approaching a little too close to me, "Rupert" raised his hand, and the former bowed low and seemed to fully understand that he was not to stand so near me. My guide then said: "These creatures have followed you from the hills. They lived there hundreds of years ago, before the country reached an appreciable measure of the civilization she at present enjoys, and, passing into the spirit state, have but little advanced, and are not much altered from the condition they were in while encased in a physical form." "Rupert," continuing, remarked that "Some of them inhabit the wilder part of the hills at this time. They do no harm to more enlightened beings, by whom ultimately they will be assisted to advance in spiritual things."

THEIR PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

I looked at them now without fear. In personal appearance they were fine and powerful beings. Their faces were brown and hairy, and their eyebrows shaggy. Their eyes had a bright and serious look about them. Their bodies were clothed with a hairy material which looked like the skin of animals, and fitted their forms so completely as to raise the doubt whether it was their own natural skin or an artificial covering. Their hair was arranged, or grew, in a kind of top-knot; it appeared to grow up instead of downwards, and was matted together.

THE UNCOUTH SPIRITS.

By this time the uncouth spirits in my chamber were talking earnestly to each other. It seemed to me like jabbering; but "Ariel" seemed to know what they said, and interpreted their language for me. They called "Rupert" the great white spirit, and wished to serve him. The spirits now commenced to manifest uneasiness, as the first rays of the morning light stole into the apartment. I saw "Rupert" raise his hand, and the children of the hills advanced towards him as if to ask his commands. They bent low while waiting his pleasure, and, after a moment, my guide smiled his adieu, and they, as if understanding that they were dismissed, gave a sort of whoop and happy laugh, and disappeared.

From Two Worlds, London, England.

SUBDUE THE ANIMAL,

the appetites, the passions and the senses, and you open the way to the centers of power, to the enfranchisement of the spirit from the imprisonment of the dictates of the carnal self. The gratification of the lower propensities deprives the higher capacities of those ethereal emanations upon which the spiritual being depends, hence every possible restraint should be applied to all abnormal thoughts and actions in direction of impulse and passion.

SUCCESS IN MEDIUMSHIP.

The strictest observation of this rule is essential to the true success in mediumship, especially in materializations. A central force is directed from the apex of the brain, and by its power we may control all the magnetic currents of our nervous organization. Those magnetic currents governing our vital organs and regulating our health may not only be increased in power and activity by means of our will, but may be used as reservoirs of vital mercy, wherewith to relieve the sufferings of others, or to aid in the repair of some less healthy function of our own being. We frequently find a healthy brain and weak stomach, or a sound heart and weak lungs, where this power of magnetism is unevenly developed in the constitution.

THE HEALING INFLUENCE

may be transmitted from every part of the body; it may be applied from the throat and lungs by the breath, from the brain through the eyes, or the whole system from the hands, and by the mother to her infant from her bosom; and the more there is given the more is received; for the electrical forces and magnetism in nature never permit of a vacuum, but rush in to replenish all exhaustions; but here again intelligence is necessary, or injury to operator and patient may result; diseases may be driven from one part of the body or brain to another and given or taken by the operator, and very serious results ensue, congestion, inflammation, and paralysis.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

is capable of expansion and exercise while in the body, and all may develop it in different degrees.

OUR PHYSICAL SIGHT.

is composed by the flesh, the nerve fibre and cell, but the spiritual sight knows no encumbrance, and only realizes stages of unfoldment, as limits of power and distance.

LIGHT AND DARKNESS

have no meaning to spiritual sight or clairvoyance; it is its own light, bearing its own torch through the varied stages of its penetration. Pleasure is experienced in its activity, and lonely imprisonment is the effect of its non-existence.

Clairvoyance elevates and

through its thousand and one windows of the soul, with their telescopic and microscopic powers and penetrations. Man may develop these lanterns to guide him in his earthly career, or he may not, and his negligence is awarded by his stumbling into pitfalls of despondency. As the desire of acquaintance, with broader perception increases, the range of vision will expand in proportion to the faith and confidence to exercise the faculty; they who have seen by faith are actual clairvoyants. Seers, old and young, ancient and modern, rich and poor, good and bad, all realize a distinct capacity entirely free from the physical sight, and in ratio to their education and development.

THE LYCEUM MOVEMENT is extending, and the annual conference in May last indicated a decided increase of activity and determination to push on in the work for the rising generation.

THE LYCEUM BANNER,

enlarged and improved, in 1897 should help these efforts even more fully than in the past, and the testimonial to Alfred Kitson, as a mark of appreciation of his self-sacrificing labors and of esteem for himself, indicates a growing spirit of willingness to recognize the services of true-hearted workers which it is cheering to witness. We sincerely trust that the rate of progress in Lyceum work will be more than maintained during 1897.

NO REASON FOR DESPONDENCY.

Some people are inclined to take gloomy views regarding the present state of our movement, but we see no reason for despondency. On the contrary, we see every reason for hope and enthusiasm—for satisfaction and cheerful anticipation. Never in the whole history of the Cause were so many inquirers—so many mediums, so many societies, so many seances, or so much general activity as at the present time.

The To-Morrow of Death,

---OR THE---

Future Life According to Science.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH BY S. R. CROCKEE.

A VERY FASCINATING WORK.

This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author is not a Spiritualist—he even mentions Spiritualists as "devotees of a new superstition," etc., etc., in which he manifests the usual animus of the "scientific class," yet he says again: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of Earth;" and he goes on to relate instances of fact in evidence. There is, to a Spiritualist, a manifest discrepancy in the author's ideas, but the well-read mind will readily select and arrange the pros and cons, and out of the whole will find not only good mental culture, but much valuable information. The author holds the theory of reincarnation. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRIT

— AND —

THE SPIRIT WORLD.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

MAN

—IN THE—

PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

A POPULAR ACCOUNT OF Results of recent scientific research regarding the origin, position and prospects of mankind. From the German of

DR. LUDWIG BÜCHNER,

Author of "Force and Matter," Essays on Nature and Science," "Physiological Pictures," "Six Lectures on Darwin," Etc.

"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only our personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our race, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—in short, in the entire material and physical contribution which, during our short personal existence, we have furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of nature in general."—Buechner.

PERFECT MOTHERHOOD;

Or Mabel Raymond's Resolve.

BY LOIS WAISBROOKER. THIS IS a novel written with a purpose, and that purpose is not merely to enable an unthinking, idle mind to while away the time in a state of idle blessedness, devoid of earnest thought or care for either self-improvement or the good of humanity. It is a book designed especially, primarily, for mothers and those who are to be mothers; and secondly, through the mothers, to effect the well-being and happiness of the race. It brings strongly and clearly to view the result upon the child of proper surroundings and influences bearing upon the mother previous to maternity. Incidentally the author touches upon various things in modern social and business life, which are unjust, and fix unequal burdens upon the individuals composing society as a whole. The book is trenchant, instructive and very interesting, even when regarded merely as a novel, and is especially commended to "women everywhere," to whom it is dedicated. It also thoroughly shows up the Jesuitical spirit of the Catholic Church; advanced ideas relating to the Spiritual philosophy are introduced. It contains a fine likeness of the author. It contains 345 pages, neatly bound in cloth. Price by mail, prepaid, $1.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of the distinguished author, speaker and medium,

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

J. J. Fly: Q. Is there any evidence that there is a specific vital influence or nervous aura passing from an operator to a hypnotic subject? Is animal magnetism concerned in any way with producing insensibility, when the operator is concealed by a screen, unknown to the subject, and apparently produces that result by his will?

A. The best authorities do not now believe in a specific fluid or aura. They claim that mesmeric influence is produced by vibrations in the spirit ether, as heat and light are in the light ether. Hypnotism by suggestion is a low stage of magnetism or mesmerism. Suggestion is a valuable means of bringing the subject into harmony with the operator. When this is once established, the will is sufficient, and the knowledge of the subject that he is being operated upon, and contact is not necesssary. Spirits form such harmonious connection with each other, that they receive each other's thought-waves across thousands of miles of space, and are able to impress mediums from remote distances. The magnetic operator may, in a similar manner, affect his subject. If we consider that:

Animals can can influence animals;
Man can influence animals;
Animals can influence man;
Man can influence man,

it will be seen that "suggestion" is a subordinate factor in the result.

G. W. Pyles, Ind. Ter.: Q. If immortality and spirit return are fixed and demonstrated facts, governed by nature's immutable laws, why should Spiritualists wrangle or contend with each other as to whether the Hebrew Bible, with all of its mistakes, cruelties and inconsistencies, contains or offers any proof of those facts; or whether the teachings of Jesus Christ and his supposed followers have any bearing upon the same?

If Spiritualism is a science, why should books or persons be cited as proof, that were wholly ignorant and at fault upon every other scientific subject?

A. The supporters of all new movements have a desire to show that these are direct outgrowths of the old, and rest on them for support. Whatever Spiritualism there is in the Bible, and there is a good deal, is valuable as historic evidence, and it is pleasing to note the shadowy unfolding of spiritual affirmations. Yet, if the Bible and all other sacred books were stricken out of existence, not the least injury would be inflicted on Spiritualism. This correspondent takes a most correct and commendable view. The Chinese Sacred Books of the Kings, the Vedas of the Hindus, the Koran of the Moslem are valuable as evidence of ancient Spiritualism.

H. Augir: Q. (1) In reading the debate between Theodore Parker and Henry Clay, delivered at Dodworth Hall, December 16, 1850, through Mrs. C. L. V. Hatch, the question came in my mind: How long does it take a person, after having left the form, to acquire a knowledge of moral right and wrong? It seems that Henry Clay had been in spirit-life at that time eight years, as the Encyclopedia says, he died in 1852. In that debate he upholds slavery; says "the South cannot do without their slaves;" says "they are better off than in their native Africa;" says "we leave its final obliteration in the hands of him who knows better than we what is right and what is wrong." Why did not Henry Clay wake up in spirit-life and say slavery was the sum of all villainies, as John Wesley said?"

(2) One of our inspired poets, T. L. Harris, I think, said: "There is not a poet in all creation, but chants from an inward inspiration." The poet Dryden says: "We who are priests of Apollo, have not the inspiration when we please; but must wait till the god comes rushing on us, and invades us with a fury which we are not able to resist." This being true, who or what caused Milton to write Paradise Lost, or Polk to write The Course of Time, and Watts and many others that write what to us are fictions of the grossest kind?

A. (1) The difficulty presented by Mr. Augir is increased when it is taken into consideration that Henry Clay was at heart opposed to slavery. When only twenty years of age, his voice was raised in the convention called to frame a constitution for the embryo State of Kentucky, that provisions be made for the gradual abolition of slavery. He was foremost in the famous compromise whereby Missouri was admitted as a slave State, and all territory north given to freedom. It was a compromise to save the Union, the life of which was threatened by the slaveholders. His defeat by Polk for the presidency, turned on the fact that the former was pledged to the extension of slavery even though war with Mexico followed. Having all his earth-life, from his first public act, regarded slavery as a wrong, difficult to deal with, yet to be conciliated until some favorable opportunity for its abolition was presented, it would be inferred from all known psychic laws that he would have seen the atrocious iniquity in the new light, and proclaimed against it.

Yet he might have been actuated by the same motives which dominated him while here—the fear of the dismemberment of the Union, the danger of which no statesman of his time so clearly saw. He was painfully conscious of this danger, and foresaw that if the question was publicly agitated fratricidal conflict was sure to follow. It was Henry Clay, the earthly statesman, who discussed, not the emancipated spirit-Clay. The arguments are the same he presented in his speeches in the Senate, over and over again, and there is not a flash of new thought from spirit-life.

Granting that it was Henry Clay who discussed, we must believe that in coming into contact with the earth-life he became influenced by the same motives and fears that fettered his magnanimous spirit while in the body. Otherwise we must suppose some spirit acted the part.

This brings us to the real question, how long a time does it take for spirits to change their views, cast error aside and gain the truth? That depends entirely on the spirit, its surroundings, the friends it may have to assist. Some may meet immediate change, while others may remain for very, very long periods, cherishing their ignorance. Those who are dwarfed by superstition, and are stubborn in their bigoted ideas, sneering at the interceding teachers who come to them, remain unchanged, until by some cause they are awakened.

(2) All poets may be inspired, but not all inspiration is infallible or necessarily true. Inspiration must partake of its source, and also of the medium through which it is given. The church-member if ever entranced, sees in his vision the New Jerusalem, and Christ and angels, with God on a throne. And Milton saw the visions of the fall of man, through the thick clouds of his religious education, aside from it's being given to him by spirits as befogged by myths as himself. It was the plan of those spirits, to fasten the story in the minds of men, that the scheme of redemption might the more eagerly be accepted. It must be admitted that no plan of priestly cunning could have better succeeded. The fall of man, and the dependent scheme of salvation, owes more to Paradise Lost than to the Bible for its retention by the religious world. Every inspired person attracts inspiring intelligences like himself, and the stream must take the form of the vessel which receives it. Watts put in rhyme the doctrines he believed, which the innumerable singers of these astonishing verses believed, and were equally believed by the spiritual beings attracted to him and no better informed than while in earth-life.

M. A., Norwood: Q. On what day of the week was July 21, 1837?

A. Friday.

C. L., California: Q. I am in a condition worse than hell. I lost my wife after five happy years, but not by death—she now loves another man. I left her in anger, and when she sent for me, I would not go back. I then relented and went back, and she would have nothing to do with me. Her heart is stone. If I cannot get her back, I want to spiritualize myself so I can console myself with my departed friends. I hope God will raise me up. What do the intelligences advise? I have read of means, hypnotic or otherwise, by which attraction can be gained. Is it possible?

A. It would seem that after two persons had lived happily together for five years, they might continue on unless some terribly repulsive revelation of character was made. If there were any means by which those repelled from each other, could be attracted, as by hypnotism, it would be harmful in the last degree to employ it. If such attraction is the result of likeness, adaptability becomes a false guide in the choice of companion.

In this case your correspondent deceives himself with the idea that his wife loves another, which he does not believe in his heart, and which is not true. He is weak in will, yet arbitrary and passionate, and is not willing that the best executive should rule. He has started a rebellion against her superior ability, and finds that the government stays with the one most capable.

There is but one plain and honest course in such a case. It is to meet and calmly talk the matter over and come to an understanding. The grievances in most such cases are magnified mole-hills, and it is well to remember that few people are so well adapted to each other that no differences arise. A discord now and then sweetens the music.

But if the divergence is so great that there is no hope of forgetfulness of wrongs and of reconciliation, better each go his or her way, with as much regard for the other as possible. This correspondent cannot in his present perturbed state of mind, receive the desired consolation from his departed friends, although they doubtless would gladly comfort him were they able. Sunshine through stormy clouds might as well be expected. Nor can he hope for "God to raise him up." He must rely on himself to escape the hell his passionate disposition, his lack of self-control, and forgetfulness of the rights of others, has brought to him.

Jas. Sherman: Q. When were the Russian serfs liberated?

A. By Alexander II., in 1861. It has been claimed, and has not been contradicted, that communications received by this czar from the spirit of his predecessor, through the mediumship of D. D. Home, who married into the royal family, and for whose son the czar stood godfather, hastened this event which by a stroke of the pen gave freedom to twenty millions of people.

A. W., Akron, O.: Q. In a trumpet seance, the spirit felt in my vest pocket for a pencil, which I gave, and it threw it on the floor. The medium said it could not use it, because of the metal on it, viz., a little tin ring on its top. I have thought about it ever since, how the spirit could not use that pencil with a little tin top, and could in the same seance handle and speak through a large tin trumpet. Please explain.

A. The reason assigned is a mere subterfuge, and ought to have set this correspondent thinking.

WHAT WAS IT?

To the Editor:—Upon reading an article in the last issue of your paper, on the subject of thought transference, I was reminded of an incident that transpired during the rebellion of which I was cognizant.

My son was a member of the 1st Reg. of Wisconsin Cavalry, which with other troops was for some time encamped at Cape Girardeau, Mo., during which time a large body of the "rebs" came down upon them and gave them battle, came out second best in the affair and retreated. Our cavalry force pursued them and drove them out of the State.

My wife began to be considerably excited over the matter, fearing that our son had met with some misfortune, as he had been in the habit of keeping a journal and sending it to us in weekly installments and it had failed to make its regular appearance. One morning at the breakfast table she remarked that she had experienced a very singular dream; that on the preceding night she dreamed that we had a letter from our son; that it was encased in a white envelope, with the proper superscription, and in addition to that was written diagonally across one corner: "Back at the Cape all right."

At that time we received our mail only twice a week. About a week subsequent to that time I was at the Post Office when the mail arrived, and was present with the Post Master when he overhauled the mail. While sorting it he threw out a package to me, saying: "Here, Barnet, is one for you."

I took it up and looked at it, and behold! There was the package of my wife's dream, corresponding in every particular with her description given a week before. What was it? Was it thought transference? Was it a spirit telegram, or what was it?

M. S. BARNETT.

A STARTLING FACT.

The Progressive Thinker was the only Spiritualist paper that had the enterprise to publish Prof. Barrett's address before the National Association Convention of Spiritualists We have his address, covering three pages, and five other fine addresses and articles, one by Col, Ingersoll, grouped in one paper, and we want to send out 1,000,000 of them. It is worth ten times its weight in gold.

GOLDEN THOUGHT.

Evil is imperfection, to be overcome by man's continuous growth toward perfection.

SUBJECT: WHAT IS EVIL?

For the higher groups: The imperfections, that is, antagonisms in the natural world give rise to the idea of evil.

As the sunshine and bountiful harvest suggest the presence of a good deity, the storm, whirlwind, hail, pestilence equally speak of an evil one.

Whatever antagonizes the desires or well-being of man he regards as evil.

The sense in which evil is usually understood is theological. It is asserted that all things were created good, and now they are apparently otherwise; it is again asserted that it is because man inherits a great sin through the transgression of Adam. History proves that the farther back we go the more savage man becomes, and hence instead of being created perfect he was created very imperfect—as a man, and began as an animal.

In this study he finds that everything is controlled by law; that there is a constant tendency toward perfection, through conflict to harmony.

Ultimately all will become harmonious, and evil be ruled out of the world.

Man is on one side an angel, on the other an animal. If the animal rules the spiritual, the result will be evil, for it is man's high destiny for the spiritual in him to triumph over the animal.

Evil as a distinct entity is a chimera, as is the god of evil.

For the younger groups: The leaders should engage the members to relate stories, incidents in their own lives, where they have acted wrongly or rightly. Then speak to them of the distinction between these two lines of action. They never regret right-doing; it makes them happy. They always regret wrong-doing, and it makes them unhappy. Why should you obey your parents?

Why should you treat respectfully your schoolmates?

Why should you strive to get your lessons?

It will readily occur to the leaders that the answers to these and many similar questions, are found in the natural desire of everyone to become respected, as a worthy man or woman; and that all hold such high ideals proves that they can realize them.

The government of the majority is a government of mediocracy.

The advanced thinkers of the world are always in the minority.

They who are best pleased to hug a delusion, even though they know it to be such, must retain their fond idol.

Knowledge has no dungeon or gibbet; she abhors persecution, and her savior is the growth which is the birthright of the soul.

A spectacle at which we may laugh or weep: A preacher, with dead ideas, preaching to a dead church!

Free souls, emancipated from the bonds of darkness, breathe full breath and think without fear!

Scorn the cringing slave, the narrow bigot, the weakness of ignorance.

Those who leave the physical life out of morality, make a grievous mistake. Had not Calvin been physically diseased, he would not have burned Servetus. Gall in his blood, produced intolerance and cruelty in the mind.

A jaundiced preacher preaches a jaundiced theology.

There is a gospel too little taught—the Gospel of Health.

I will help the helpless, and be kind and thoughtful as I would have others be to me.

I will not yield to injustice.

A SPIRIT MESSAGE.

RECEIVED BY THE LOGAN PSYCHIC SOCIETY OF OGDEN, UTAH, NEW YEAR'S EVE.—WRITTEN AUTOMATICALLY BY ONE OF ITS MEMBERS—BY ONE OF OUR "SPIRIT FRIENDS."

It has occurred to me to write a little message to the circle. It is always a pleasure for a spirit to return to earth and communicate when conditions are favorable, and those to whom the message is sent are of a proper receptivity. It is not easy, however, nor pleasant for one to speak or write to those who listen only for the purpose of criticising or finding fault, or who go away after hearing facts stated that, on account of their ignorance of the laws or conditions of spirit associations and communication, they cannot appreciate or understand, and make game of the message and the medium.

There are many things respecting this philosophy that cannot be made known or proclaimed from every house-top. There are conditions often surrounding spirits who have passed over, that it is not right or permissible to make known. There are many things that cannot be understood by mortals until after long years of study and association with advanced spirits. To these may be gradually unfolded more and more of the infinite truth. And so, when questions are asked of spirits communicating with you, you should not feel surprised that in some cases you do not get satisfactory answers. Persevere, study and in charity and love continue your growth and spiritual unfoldment and you shall, in good time, know all things. For no less end are we progressing. The onward and upward course of every soul aims at this point. It is possible for every poor spirit that has once inhabited this earthly body to so grow in knowledge and power that no fact in all the universe shall be hid from him. But in whatever direction he may turn, there absolute certainty of knowledge and understanding await him.

What a grand and glorious state that is: Nevermore through all eternity to say, "I don't know," or to feel that there are others more learned than ourselves.

Then, too, we shall attain the realms of perfect love, till never an unkind thought or an uncharitable act shall be known—till each shall love the whole universe of God, and all animate and inanimate nature, with that perfect affection that banishes all fear or misunderstanding—till we shall feel and know that we are at one with God and all his creatures, and none may say aught against us. How blessed shall that rest be for us, poor tempest-tossed mariners as we are, on the sea of life, cast hither and thither on the billows of worldly hate and criticism. O sister, O brother, beaten down by the scoffs and stings of the cruel world, look up; hold high your courage, never faltering in your allotted place; your night of sorrows will soon be gone, and, "Joy cometh in the morning."

Then we shall attain perfect peace and rest. The battle of life shall soon be over. The enemy we have so long fought, whether the fight be against wrongs and imperfections of our own natures, or to protect ourselves from the injury that others seek to do us, they shall be past and we shall walk in peace and rest beside the still waters, in blissful communion with all that is pure and good and true in God's universe.

Oh, how blessed it is to exist, to have before us such joy, such peace, such bliss. Do we understand it as we plod along from day to day, you in your place and I in mine? Do we keep before our minds the goal for which we strive? It seems to me not, or we would not so often be found doing the things that we do, that we know are wrong. I have looked in the faces of all this circle, and I have seen much to commend, much of high purpose, nobly persevered in, courage in the cause of Truth; but I have also seen down in the hearts of each one, and I have there read things that have grieved me, things that should not be recorded in your lives, things that you will have to wipe out with sorrow and repentance. I say these things fairly, in love and charity. I know the inevitable result, and I only tell you what is as certain as the existence of God himself. Think not that you can escape, or that any denial to your own conscience can avail you. Be warned. Wipe out the record of wrong to yourself and to your fellowmen here and now. Don't wait till you come over here, because if you do, it will be the harder to atone. Begin now to fill your lives with acts of charity and brotherly love. Quit the things that in your hearts you know are wrong. Build up for yourselves, now, pure characters, free from all taint, and thereby purify your bodies until you stand forth strong in mind; strong in body, firm in the knowledge that makes you free. I urge you thus plainly, without rhetoric, because I love you each one and I must warn you. Of what use for you to associate with us and hear our words if we, on account of our superior knowledge and experience cannot influence you to live better, purer lives? We don't come here for show, for amusement, either to you or ourselves. We come to teach the truth—to build you up in knowledge and power so that you may become messengers to others who know not the way. And we want to see improvement in your lives as a result of our teachings. We don't want to mark the dark scenes of your lives to continue, without improvement. We want to see higher thoughts write their impress upon your brows. We want to read good acts lovingly performed, printed in letters of gold upon your hearts; we want to know that more and more your influence is radiating among your fellows a feeling of love and charity and bringing about a recognition by them that you have found a truth more precious than gems, more lovely than the morning, more enduring than the eternal hills.

Let us come into your hearts and lives more and more. Don't think of us as being near you only when you come here, but grow to feel our presence in your homes, by your firesides, hovering over your beds when you sleep, that no evil influences may come near you, bending above you as you ask God's blessings upon you, and listening as you speak in loving tones of your dear spirit friends.

Our mission is to help you, to do good to you, to bring into your lives a better influence than was ever there before. We are disappointed if we cannot do so, through the indifference of those to whom we come; and we are happy if we are successful in bringing happiness and contentment where it did not before exist.

And now, with this exceedingly plain talk, which I trust you may all receive in the spirit of kindness in which it is sent, I will close, wishing you all a Happy New Year of progress and unfoldment in this blessed Truth.

PROF. B. F. UNDERWOOD.

BEFORE THE PSYCHICAL AND LIBERAL ASSOCIATION LAST NIGHT—DISCOUNTS EMOTIONAL GOSPEL.

To the Editor:—On the evening of March 8th, B. F. Underwood, of Chicago, lectured before a highly cultured audience at Meriden, Ct., under the auspices of the Psychical and Liberal society. His subject was: "The Gospel Emotion and Ignorance, or the Rationale of Religious Revivals."

He was introduced by Albert Gustine, president of the society. The speaker said that the religious element is universal and serves as the basis of all religious excitements. We never think of ascribing the excitement of a political campaign to supernatural influence. We see how it is engendered and sustained. Religious revivals are not less natural. Theological beliefs—a heaven to gain, a hell to shun, a personal Savior, through whom only salvation is possible—these are the beliefs of Christendom. Arouse the emotions and intensify these beliefs and people are in a condition for conviction and conversion. Then, a favorable time is that following a financial panic, and an industrial depression, and it is important that an evangelist, not a close thinker and careful reasoner, but a man of emotion, of magnetic power, a sort of galvanic battery, be secured to exert his influence upon men and women through a series of meetings. Reasoning is unfavorable to religious excitement. When the mind is in abstract thought, emotion is in abeyance.

Formerly, when belief was general, revivals were epidemic, and endemic also, that is, contagious; now skepticism and unbelief are widespread and these emotional manifestations are sporadic.

Winter is more favorable than summer, because people can be crowded into churches and halls, and subjected to hypnotic and magnetic influences. We all act largely from suggestion. We possess imitative susceptibilities; we sympathize with those among whom we are. Yawning, laughing, weeping and physical movements like dancing, are catching, so to speak, like disease. During religious revivals, emotional feelings and expressions, and bodily motions, from one individual, or a group of individuals, spread to many until in times of ignorance and faith, there seems to be a hurricane of excitement. So it was in 1857 before skepticism was as widespread as it is now.

These revivals revive a decaying theological creed, religious prejudices, religious bigotry; they revive much which is being outgrown; they arouse the animal nature; they shatter the nerves, unbalance the mind. Religious emotion does not mean morality. It is consistent with low moral conduct and unworthy ideals. A man may, like the stormy petrel in a gale, enjoy a prayer meeting and be, like the James brothers and Guiteau, a great rascal.

What we need, as Theodore Parker said in 1857, is a revival of honesty and justice, a revival that will make men pay their debts, redeem their notes when due, and give just weight and measure. High character and right conduct come from development, from education, good associations, trials, discipline and all those good influences which operate upon the members of society. A "sinner" cannot be changed into a saint in a day or a week, or a month or a year. What the clergy preach on this subject is not only false but pernicious. Morality is the efflorescence of evolution—its latest product, and it must be carefully nurtured and strengthened by education, example, and environment. These spasmodic excitements hurt rather than help it. They are not conducive to independence and self-control. The sooner they become obsolete the better for society.

Mr. Underwood will give two more lectures, one to-night, and another to-morrow night. The subject of his lecture this evening will be "Separation of the Church from the State." To-morrow evening's subject will be "Evolution vs. Creation."

Her husband's advancement in the fields both of business and politics is in no small measure due to her sanguine spirit and wise helpfulness; for Mrs. Aldrich is known as of the kind of women whose lives are given to earnest purposes and who inspire men to unflagging zeal and endeavor. Mr. and Mrs. Aldrich have a beautiful home in the mining town of Aldrich, Ala. Since their marriage, ten years ago, her excellent appreciation of the susceptibility to artistic improvement of the place and of the possibilities of improvement of the people of the vicinity has given her a secure and high place in their esteem.

Rajah Lodge, the Aldrich home, is as famed in the country round about for hospitality as it is for the beauty and luxury of its appointments and environments. Unlike any other mining town in the South, no liquor is sold at Aldrich, and police are not needed there. It is as happy a community as can be found. Its children, animals, and birds are protected and fostered, nothing being neglected by the Aldriches to administer to their proper freedom and innocent pleasures.

Mr. Aldrich has devoted much of his life to the development of the rich coal and iron ore deposits of the mineral district of Alabama, and has been one of the foremost factors in the marvelous progress of that State in mining and manufacturing. Not until recently has he taken any leading part in politics. It was his wife who urged the idea that in order to accomplish needed reforms for the community and Commonwealth the surest way was through the ballot box and by legislation, and so she persuaded her husband to stand for Congress, to which he was elected after a difficult and thrilling canvass. With a facile pen and her characteristic energy and devotion to pure purpose, Mrs. Aldrich has devoted the years of her womanhood to popular lines of reformation, such as ameliorating the harsh conditions of prisoners, the prevention of cruelty to children and animals, and to the development of "mental healing," psychical investigation and religious research.

"THE LIGHT OF EGYPT,"

OR THE SCIENCE OF THE SOUL AND THE STARS.

Finely Illustrated With Eight Full-Page Engravings.

BY AN INITIATE IN ESOTERIC MASONRY.

It is claimed that this book is not a mere compilation, but thoroughly original.

It is believed to contain information upon the most vital points of Occultism and Theosophy that cannot be obtained elsewhere.

It claims to fully reveal the most recondite mysteries of man upon every plane of his existence, both here and hereafter, in such plain, simple language that a child can almost understand it.

The secret and Occult mysteries of Astrology are revealed and explained for the first time, it is affirmed, since the days of Egyptian Hieroglyphics.

An effort is made to show that the Science of the Soul and the Science of the Stars are the twin mysteries which comprise THE ONE GRAND SCIENCE OF LIFE.

The following are among the claims made for the work by its friends:

To the Spiritual investigator this book is indispensable.

To the medium it reveals knowledge beyond all earthly price, and will prove in real truth "a guide, philosopher and friend."

To the Occult it will supply the mystic key for which he has been so long earnestly seeking.

To the Astrologer it will become a "divine revelation of Science."

OPINIONS OF PRESS AND PEOPLE.

"A noble, philosophical and instructive work."—Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten.

"A work of remarkable ability and interest."—Dr. J. R. Buchanan.

"A remarkably concise, clear and forcibly interesting work. * * * It is more clear and intelligible than any other work on like subjects."—Mr. J. J. Morse.

"A careful reading of THE LIGHT OF EGYPT discovers the beginning of a new sect in Occultism, which will oppose the grafting on Western Occultists the subtile delusive dogmas of Karma and Re-incarnation."—New York Times.

"It is a volume likely to attract wide attention from that class of scholars interested in mystical science and occult forces. But it is written in such plain and simple style as to be within the easy comprehension * * * of any cultivated, scholarly reader."—The Chicago Daily Inter Ocean.

"However recondite his book, the author certainly presents a theory of first causes which is well fitted to challenge the thoughtful readers' attention and to excite much reflection."—Hartford Daily Times.

"Considered as an exposition of Occultism, or the philosophy of the Orient from a Western standpoint, this is a remarkable production."—The Daily Tribune (Salt Lake City).

"This work, the result of years of research and study, will undoubtedly create a profound sensation throughout the philosophic world."—The Detroit Commercial Advertiser.

"It is an Occult work but not a Theosophical one. * * * It is a book entirely new in its scope and must excite wide attention."—The Kansas City Journal.

MOST WONDERFUL BOOKS.

The Warfare of Science With Theology.

A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom. By ANDREW D. WHITE, LL. D., late President and Professor of History at Cornell University. In Two Volumes. 8vo. Cloth, Five Dollars. For Sale at This Office.

In these two large volumes are combined information that the reader could not find in the libraries of the world in fifty years. It shows the constant and determined opposition of Theology to the advancement that has been made in every branch of Science. To the Student it is indispensible. Every Free Thought Speaker should have it. It should circulate in every community. It goes into minute details, citing in all cases the authority, showing the persistency of Theology in fighting new and advanced ideas in Science.

"The magnum opus of the eminent ex-President of Cornell plants a new and notable milestone along the highway of ever-advancing human thought. The work is the masterpiece of a mind as devoid of wanton iconoclasm as of moral cowardice. It is a definite statement of where the best thinkers of the world now stand in the religio-scientific conflict. It is clear, honest, brave, and must be given a place among the great books of the year."—Chicago Tribune.

"The most valuable contribution that has yet been made to the history of the conflict between the theologians and the scientists; struggles that have alarmed timid Christians, but, as Mr. White shows, there was no occasion for alarm. The several chapters are extremely interesting, and while President White never flinches in telling the whole truth, as he thinks science has ascertained it, he is nowhere irreverent. He confronts truth, takes its hand, and follows boldly wherever truth bids him come."—Buffalo Commercial.

"The book is written almost colloquially, and so interestingly as to enchain the attention at once, and keep it enchained. Concise as a history of the universe could be made, tabulated so that instant reference to a particular bit of history, theory, or biography may be had, it will be valuable as a lexicon relating to religious controversy. It is crammed with information, sorted, sifted, winnowed, and prepared for the consumer, as reading it is of an absorbing interest, and it will probably provoke answering arguments."—Chicago Times-Herald.

"Undoubtedly the most exhaustive treatise which has been written on this subject. It is able, scholarly, critical, and impartial in tone."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"A literary event of prime importance is the appearance of 'A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom.'"—Philadelphia Press.

These two large volumes, containing about 900 pages, will be sent to any address on the receipt of the price, Five Dollars.

Address THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

MORE POINTERS.

CHURCHES HAVE BEEN ENEMIES TO PROGRESS.

In a recent issue of your most valuable paper, I noted a brief article under the caption of "Two Pointers" from that staunch supporter of the Spiritualistic "church" idea, Mr. G. W. Kates, in which he called attention to the fact that in Boston a "society" had been formed to distinguish between mushrooms and toadstools, and thinks this fact should forever deter Spiritualists from forming societies, and that hereafter every Spiritualist association should be labeled church. And why so, good brother? The society to discern between mushrooms and toadstools is in the line of growth; it is to know something before unknown, that the disastrous results following the mistaking of one for the other may be avoided, and this is in the line of progress and in perfect keeping with Spiritualism. But the church, in the opinion of all intelligent, progressive minds, is and ever has been the synonym of ignorance and cowardly, slavish fear.

All "societies; whether literary, scientific, philosophical, fraternal, charitable, beneficiary, spiritual or what-not, are toward growth and helpfulness; but the work of the church is to enslave the mind, dwarf the intellect and belittle the soul.

The church stands alone, the one isolated, non-progressive institution of all time. The church has ever barred the pathway of human progress. The church has been the promoter of war; the dispenser of murder, bloodshed, cruelty and outrage. Under its sanction the most dastardly deeds have been perpetrated in the past and to-day, (if the statements of ex-priests and ex-nuns, are true,) in its name the most terrible institutions flourish; institutions that rob parents of their daughters, girlhood of its freedom and beauty, and womanhood of its purity and glory. Go enter the convents and nunneries and behold there the awful depths of infamy of the church. And then go back through the history of the ages, enter a church of Alexandria in the Fifth Century, and behold the beautiful, gifted, modest Hypatia stripped of her clothing and torn in pieces by an infuriated mob led by priests; stand by the martyr fires kindled around the noble, manly forms of a Bruno and Servetus—witness all this as pastime for the clergy, the priests, (pastors,) and yet some Spiritualists hanker for the "church" for Spiritualism. Shades of ye mighty dead!

The "Chancel Society" of St. John's Episcopal church, of which Mr. Kates speaks, through which a bakery has been established in the church (at Cleveland) that will turn out bread and pies and doughnuts that will be fresh and palatable, is a good thing, and anybody with a modicum of sense knows that even a society whose only purpose is to serve the physical man and help to build up a strong and noble physique, is of far greater good to the world than all the mummery and mimicry and splendor of nonsense called worship carried on within the gilded, gaudy, palace church.

Give us the mushroom—toadstool "societies" every time, rather than "churches." Mushrooms and toadstools are natural healthy products of nature, but the product, or output of the church is unnatural, unhealthy, stunted, dwarfed, crooked, cramped, disfigured mental and spiritual humanity. It is the right royal duty of pastors of churches to hold their flocks in ignorance if possible. Every thinking, reading, progressive person knows that where the densest ignorance prevails, there the greatest devotion to the church is found, and for my part I could desire no greater stigma to rest upon me than to be styled "pastor" of a church.

Could the height of inconsistency, or the depths of absurdity, be carried further than in trying to unite Spiritualism, the world's great liberator, with the church the world's great enslaver?

Allow me in closing to make mention of Dr. T. Wilkins' able article in the issue of March 13.

ISLAND LAKE CAMP.

To the Editor:—The board of directors of the Island Lake Camp Association met at Lansing, January 12, to complete the election of officers, resulting in the election of William Murray, of Salem, for treasurer, and the writer for secretary. S. N. Ewell, of Romeo, was elected president at the previous meeting. The other members of the board are Richard Bartlett, of Pontiac; Alonso Anscomb, H. G. Brown, of Detroit, and A. B. Smith, of Northville.

The camp will open on July 29, and will include the five Sundays in August. Rates will be secured commencing about the middle of July for the benefit of those who wish to come in advance to fit out their cottages. We again invite the attention of Spiritualists not pledged to other camps to our beautiful location and unequaled advantages for building up an educational center, combined with a place of rest and recreation. After such papers as The Progressive Thinker, probably campmeetings are the greatest disseminators of knowledge, reaching large numbers that can be reached in no other way. Our camps and societies must be the result of direct purpose of spirits immortal, who would speak to humanity, for where else could mortals gain strength to go on with the laborous task in face of opposition from nearly every cause thinkable. In reading The Progressive Thinker these months back I have felt to reply in sympathy with the potent needs in our ranks, as set forth by the noble writers, but did not, for I have been so much of a coward because of the bitter and unjust criticism that I often receive, that I hoped and tried to drop quietly out of the struggle. Though there is no place on earth that one can drop into without finding friction, I did not conclude to abide by law incontrovertible, but was obliged (like the rest of humanity), to do so. Hence after a year out of office work, I am in the harness again.

I read President Barrett's annual address, and it appealed to me as being the exact status of affairs in our ranks; and anything that I have observed coincides with it, music and all. The majority of our speakers everywhere ably define the needs of organization, yet the work lags and languishes for need of the sustenance that belongs to it, while some of us waste our strength haggling over trifles, forgetting facts, and ignoring principles; and others remain indifferent either way.

The daily papers hold up seances supposedly under the auspices of Spiritualism, with ridicule at the credulity of the attendants and the deception practiced by the professed medium—too often with just cause. Yet we are helpless against this greatest of fraudulent practice, unless we work unitedly together and place it out of the power of any impostors to name their vile pretensions by the name of Spiritualism, that stands for the truth of spirit communion.

WHY GIVE UP HOPE?

IF OTHERS ARE CURED, WHY NOT YOU!

What John J. Culver, M. D., of Albany, Texas, late surgeon of the U. S. Army, says of Dr. Watkins' power of diagnosing:

Dear Doctor:—I almost feared that in replying to your advertisement I might have created a false impression. Lately I have given much thought to Spiritualism, and seeing your advertisement, it occurred to me that this would be one way to apply a test; but my idea was more to verify a statement than in actually asking advice; but now, after receiving your letter, I find the verifications I was seeking, only that your diagnosis is more complete, and, coming from a graduate of medicine, is more satisfactory, and brings with it more force, being a graduate myself. Your diagnose is correct in every particular: and you have arrived at the result in a way wholly unintelligible to me.

JOHN J. CULVER, M. D.

Albany, Texas.

Proving that Dr. Watkins with his psychic force can absolutely see without the X-Ray, as well as surgeons can with it:

Dr. C. E. Watkins—Dear Sir: I have been to see Dr. Simpson. He found the stricture where you said, about five and a half inches. I give you great credit for locating this as I have always been told I had no stricture; and it enabled Dr. Simpson to locate it without any trouble.

I remain yours gratefully,

A. L. HOWE.

Lawrence, Mass., Nov. 30.

Dr. Watkins—Dear Sir: My mother, Mrs. M. A. Pope, is so much better, that she wished me to write and state that she does not think she will need another month's medicine. Kindly accept thanks for treatment.

Yours Respectfully,

W. C. POPE.

Boston, Mass., Dec. 18, 1896.

Dear Dr. Watkins: Your kind letter containing receipt, received in due time. We are all well. I feel as if I should not need any more medicine. By the time I have taken the month's treatment, I think I shall feel as if I am cured, for which I feel very grateful to you and to those on the other side that have taken an interest in me. You may be sure I shall always be ready to speak in your favor to those around me afflicted. With kind regards to you I will close, from your patient.

ANNA TIBBITTS.

Hingham, Mass., Feb. 18, 1896

Dr. C. E. Watkins—Dear Sir: I am getting along very well at present, and I think I won't need any more medicine. Doctor, I am under many obligations to you for your treatment, and also your fair dealings.

As ever, I remain yours,

speakers and mediums of different phases. The Children's Progressive Lyceum in the evening will give a short entertainment consisting of recitations, literary and musical selections.

E. J. Bowtell writes from Canton, Ohio: "Two mass-meetings were held here yesterday under the auspices of the N. S. A. On both occasions the large assembly room, City Hall, was crowded. In the evening many were unable to find even standing room. Addresses were made by President H. D. Barrett and Hon L. V. Moulton. Miss Maggie Gaule gave many recognized tests at the close of each session. I may be addressed for camp-meeting and other engagements later than May at 900 Marion street, Canton, O."

The Church of the Soul will celebrate the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, Sunday, March 28. Exercises by the Sunday-school, 10:30 a. m. Evening services, 8 p. m. Subject: "Spiritualism the Herald of the New Dispensation."

The Band of Harmony will meet with Mrs. Fuller, 221 Leland avenue, Ravenswood, March 25, at 3 and 8 p. m.

E. C. Getsinger, a sublime theorizer (and who can refute him?) is now in the city. March 18 he lectured on "Vibrations" at All Souls' Church. Last Monday he lectured at Masonic Temple, 810 Chapel Hall. In his opinion he has "reconstructed science," and challenges the scientists to demolish his foundation if they can.

B. C. Cooley writes: "Dr. J. W. Magoon and his nice little wife spent a week at Marshall, Texas. They lectured three times and held four circles. The people were much pleased with their work, and quite as much with their deportment and honesty. Their work is simple, convincing and exalting."

J. M. Tripp writes: "Mrs. Tripp and myself have been in Grand Rapids, Mich., one week, working under the auspices of the Band of Harmony, and find quite a growing interest in all things spiritual. There are four flourishing societies and puite a number of earnest workers who will in time set an example for others to follow in the way of progression and aggression."

SPIRITUALISTS, ATTENTION!

In a few ays there will be the Forty-

In a few days there will be the Fortyism, which you, no doubt, all will celebrate. Remember, on that day the needs of the National Association. The demands upon this institution for printed matter alone requires a constant outlay of cash. We must meet this constant demand for our tracts, and have just placed an order for twenty thousand. Will you help us in this work? Remember, you can become a contributing member for one dollar. Will at least one thousand Spiritualists celebrate the anniversary by becoming contributing members of the National Spiritualists' Association?

Do not let it be said that the missionary work must be stopped for lack of funds. A certificate will be mailed to you at once as a contributing member on receipt of your dollar; also a copy of the History of the National Association. Reports of Conventions of the N. S. A., twenty-five cents each, or one dollar for the four reports. No Spiritualist's library complete without them. If you endorse the N. S. A., let us hear from you at once. The Board of Trustees meets on April 6, at Washington. I hope the Spiritualists of America will respond to this call, and one thousand dollars be ready to encourage them in their work. Will you be one of a thousand to send a dollar?

of all diseases that flesh is heir to, and will give you proof of her powers, by sending requirements as per small advertisement for diagnosis of your case. Here is one of her many cures:

St. Louis, June 21, 1896.

MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.

With affectionate regards, very truly,

PASSED TO SPIRIT-LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free.]

Mrs. Dr. M. E. Larson passed to spirit-life February 26, 1897, at Ogden, Utah. Mrs. Larson was born in England, May 13, 1848. Her life was a life of action, ever faithful, ever true. Her passing away was peaceful, and smiling, she said: "They are calling me home—I must go—I can stay no longer." And with a smile on her face she passed away.

Passed to a higher life, Mrs. Katie George, wife of Joel W. George, at Denver, Col., Sunday, February 28, 1897. The remains were brought to Lincoln, Neb., and funeral services were held at the Universalist church, that city, and conducted by Rev. Amae Wheeler, the well-known medium. Mrs. George was 36 years of age, and was preceded to spirit-life by five children—three girls and two boys. She leaves a husband and no children. Mr. George is a brother of Dr. P. S. George.

DR. P. S. GEORGE.

Mrs. Enfield Leach passed to spirit-life from her home in Randolph, N. Y., February 26, in her 76th year. She was many years a firm Spiritualist, strong in her convictions and frank and open in the expression of the same. She was a woman whose life was good and true, and has passed to her reward. A husband and two sons survive her. The funeral services were conducted from the Congregational church, by Mrs. Clara Watson, inspirational speaker.

XXX.

Passed to a higher life, Saturday, January 16th, Mrs. Alzina A. Pierce, of San Diego, Cal., aged 73 years. She was a devoted Spiritualist for forty years, expressing her love for the cause by large donations of property to the First Spiritual Society of San Diego during her earth-life, thus setting an example worthy of emulation by every true Spiritualist. Her funeral was conducted in a truly Spiritualistic manner; the services were eloquently rendered by the guides of Rev. Mary Morrill, of the First Spiritual Society. According to the request of Mrs. Pierce, all decorations at the funeral were white, including the hearse, horses, etc. Mrs. Pierce leaves a husband and many friends who will mourn the loss of her physical presence. In the transition of Mrs. Pierce, Spiritualism has lost one of its most loyal workers. May her devotion to our beloved cause prove an incentive to others to follow in her footsteps.

H. D. B.

A brief and appropriate service was held over the remains of Mrs. Hattie Trudell, at the residence of Mrs. Jennie Hunt, No. 10 North Lincoln street, at 1 o'clock p. m., Tuesday, the 9th inst., by Mrs. Sarah E. Bromwell, pastor of the Spiritual Endeavor Society, of No. 1 South Hoyne avenue. Mrs. Trudell being a Spiritualist for many years, made a request that in case of her death, she wanted Mrs. Bromwell to officiate, as she had attended many of her seances. The expression of peace was on the face of the deceased, showing an unwavering faith in this beautiful philosophy.

MRS. JENNIE HUNT.

Chicago, Ill.

I am requested to report the transition of Jane A. Newton, of Willoughby, Lake county, Ohio, who passed to spirit-life Sunday, March 7, and whose funeral services were conducted by Dr. F. Schermerhorn, at the family home, on the shore of Lake Erie. She was a life-long Spiritualist, and for forty-two years she had lived in perfect peace and harmony with her beloved husband, and during all these years of sunshine and shadow, not one unkind or angry word had ever passed between them. She has left behind her naught but the remembrance of a sweet, pure, loving life among her large circle of friends and neighbors, who were compelled to respect her Spiritualistic views when they saw her daily life was the sweet expression of a pure spirituality and lofty inspiration.

DR. F. SCHERMERHORN.

Lydia A. Beck passed to a higher life from her home in Lewisburg, O., on the 24th of February, 1897, at the age of 73 years. She enjoyed the philosophy of Spiritualism for the last thirty-five years.

A FRAGMENT OF OLD SUPERSTITION AND INTOLERANCE.

ILLINOIS LAW FOR WITCHES—OLD ENGLISH STATUTES ARE STILL IN FORCE IN THIS STATE—FORTUNE TELLERS AND CLAIRVOYANTS MAY BE ARRESTED AND TRIED—BURNING AND HANGING THE PENALTIES PRESCRIBED FOR THEIR TRADE—TWO INSTANCES WHERE THE LAW DECREED DEATH TO THE ACCUSED.

It would be lawful to burn at the stake every Spiritualist medium and clairvoyant and fortune teller in Chicago, says the last Sunday's Chronicle.

Positively, seriously and without the slightest suggestion of romance, there is law in Illinois to warrant the arrest, trial, conviction and death by hanging, burning or other method of every man or woman in this State who pretends to tell fortunes or reveal the future or locate hidden treasure or influence persons in love affairs. The witchcraft laws of old England are in force in Illinois. They have never been repealed. There is no reason in law why the scenes of Salem, Mass., should not be repeated here in Chicago.

As to the probability of such a thing being done, that is another matter. As to the public sentiment and the changes four centuries have wrought in that foundation of all enforced legislation, of course it would not permit such a thing as is here suggested. But it may interest you to follow somewhat the subject of witchcraft and its punishment. In the first place, any lawyer will tell you that the following language may be found in chapter 28, revised statutes of Illinois:

Be it enacted that the common law of England so far as the same is applicable and of general nature, and all statutes and acts of the British parliament made in aid of and to supply to the fourth year of James I., and which are of general nature, and not local to that kingdom, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as of full force and effect until repealed by legislative authority.

Here is the text of a law passed prior to the fourth year of James I. of "a nature and not local to that kingdom:

All persons invoking any evil spirit, or consulting, covenanting with or entertaining, employing, feeding or rewarding any evil spirit, shall suffer death.

That law was passed in 1603. It is in the British statutes at large, volume 4, chapter 12, page 599. Lord Bacon was a member of the house of commons at the time and gave the measure his approval.

TO DETECT A WITCH.

Lord Coke, whose name is inseparably associated with English law, tells us what was the common law of England which this later State of Illinois ingrafted on its statute books, and he also tells us how we may detect a witch, and submits in his Institutes some excellent general observations on the subject.

He tells us that the common law of England had well established the doctrine that witches were felons. The Statute of James I., referred to, only put into writing that spirit of the law which had long been fixed. "Before the conquest it (witchcraft) was severely punished," he says, "and after it was made felony by Elizabeth, and again by James, which repealeth 5 Elizabeth." Then he proceeds to define the offense:

A conjurer is he that, by the holy and powerful names of God, invokes and consults with him, or to do some act. A witch is a person that hath conference with the Devil to consult with him, or to do some act. "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."—Ex., chap. 22; Deut., chap. 18—10, 11, 12.

And you want the laws for it? Then read this page, page 44, Coke's Institutes, edition of 1797:

I have seen a report of a case in an ancient register that in October, anno 20H., 6, Margery Gurdeman, of Eye, in the county of Suffolk, was for witchcraft and consultation with the Devil, and after sentence and relapse, burnt by the king's writ de heratico comburendo; and this agreeth with antiquity for witches and so forth were by the laws before the conquest burnt to death.

And the very next page of these Institutes tells how detectives and sleuths may proceed to prepare a case for the police:

If any person or persons shall use, practice or exercise any invocation or conjuration of any evil or wicked spirit;

If any person or persons take upon him or them by witchcraft, enchantment, charme or sorcery to tell or declare in what place any treasure of gold or silver may be found or had in the earth or other secret places;

Or where goods or other things lost or stolen should be found or become;

Or to the intent to provoke any persons to unlawful love;

Or whereby any cattle or goods of any person shall be destroyed;

Or to hurt or destroy any person in his or her body, although the same be not effected or done.

HANGING ONLY AN INCIDENT.

And then follows the punishment. Hanging by the neck until the felon convicted shall die is but a circumstance. It is a mere incident. If a man, his wife loses her dower. If a woman, her husband loses his inheritance. Corruption of blood and the forfeiture of all good is implied.

Of course, the method of inflicting the death penalty was left entirely to the court and jury. As a matter of record burning was employed almost as frequently as was hanging. In the case of one gentle old man whose friends interceded for him the severity of the court was relaxed so generously that he was simply hanged in chains at "the Five Forkes" in the county of Essex, and his body was painted with tar and left hanging as a continuous threat; and the further sentence of the court was that the gentle old victim must be tarred again each Michaelmas and still left hanging; so that history records he "lasted" somewhat more than seven years.

It may be protested by some delvers into deep and curious records that the statute of James I., passed in 1603, was repealed under Henry VIII. in 1736. But our Illinois law simply ingrafts what was common law in England prior to the fourth year of the reign of James I., and witchcraft was at that time a felony both by the statute law and by the still older common law of the realm. And it was not "local to that kingdom" either.

Furthermore, when the first laws were made in the province of Virginia a paragraph was engrafted close after the enacting clause, in which the common law of England was made the law of the province. That law long antedated the repealing statute of Henry in 1736. It was the fundamental law of Virginia, and all that territory embraced in Virginia province. It included the magnificent realm northwest of the Ohio river, acquired by George Lewis Clark. It was the law of the Northwest territory, and went with that realm when it passed from Virginia to the general government in 1787. It was the fundamental rule in Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois and Wisconsin.

WITCHCRAFT IN ILLINOIS.

Wherever the common law is not repealed by statute, in these States that common law is in force, and the common law that Lord Coke tells us made witchcraft a felony has never been repealed in Illinois.

And, moreover, this law has been invoked in Illinois. Under the operations of that old common law the bitter witchcraft laws of King James' times at least two persons are known to have perished. In Davidson and Stuve's "History of Illinois," covering the period from 1673 to 1884, there is at page 230-231 the account of the killing of a negro named Moreau, charged with witchcraft. It happened in 1790. True, the State was not admitted to the union until twenty-eight years later. But the fact remains that on the soil of Illinois the old common law as to witchcraft was executed.

Moreau was a black man brought into the country near Cahokia by a Frenchman from New Orleans. He was left at Cahokia by his master, who disappeared, and was ever after regarded as a free man. He seems to have been a provident fellow, for he acquired some property. He occupied a bit of land not far from town and raised swine. He was peculiarly successful. One season when some malady almost exterminated the swine in that section of country Moreau's pigs were not at all troubled, and in the risen price of pork his neighbors saw the fruits of necromancy. So they proceeded regularly against Moreau. They arrested him, charged him with witchcraft, convicted him and hung him. The accusers seem at the last to have seen the wisdom of fixing the case on something aside from business, for they charge the man with having made away with his master "by the power of his devilish incantations." The fact that the mistress remained in Cahokia was accounted for by the statement that she "was too strong for his charms."

Further than this, a woman— and a white woman at that—is shown by the same historians to have been put to death in the territory of Illinois on a charge of witchcraft. So there is a precedent for you.

ANY WITNESS WOULD CONVICT.

Now, apply the rule. Do you suppose that a Spiritualistic medium would have been permitted successfully to deny his commerce with the evil one in King James' time? Why, no. The charge once brought, anyone who had attended a seance presided over by that medium would be a competent, a convincing witness.

A few days ago the Chronicle published a dispatch from LaGrange, Ind., telling how Mrs. Coffeen, a society woman suffered a broken wrist at a seance while trying to strip the mysterious disguise from a medium. Why, if the people at LaGrange could invoke the old law against witchcraft, a medium's very advertisement would be a confession of guilt; for the law is as effective there as here.

There are, in to-day's papers, perhaps a score of advertisements inserted by men and women who claim powers beyond the region of the natural. They offer to peer into the future, and advise one with regard to business ventures; with regard to love affairs; with regard to enemies. They offer in explicit terms to tell where lost or stolen property may be found—and they have patrons every day in the week, too. They offer to lift the veil as to the future, and recite in substance the whole of your past. They could not by any selection place themselves more directly in the line of acts prohibited by that old statute of King James.

It is a matter of public opinion, of course. There is law enough to hang them, or burn them and to confiscate all their property, and to place a bar sinister on all their children. But the law is not enforced, and will not be, because the only really effective law in civilization—the law of public opinion—does not approve, and will not tolerate such action.

But suppose someone were to file an information with the State's Attorney. Suppose someone were to go before the grand jury and, invoking that old law still unrepealed, demand an indictment. And suppose a "true bill" should be returned, and the State's Attorney should cause a warrant to be issued. Imagine the trial.

The accused person would be arrested and thrown into jail. It was not customary in the days when the law was enforced to accord much privilege of such culprits. The prisoner would languish in irons in the darkest cell. No friend might come to him. No lawyer would be permitted to advise. No minister would be allowed to bring the consolation of religion. On the first day possible after the arrest the prisoner would be brought into court. The witnesses would be required to tell all they know.

SAMPLE TESTIMONY.

In the case of Mrs. Bishop, tried at Salem, Mass., under the forms and ceremonies of this law, one witness testified that the woman paid him some money for plowing and immediately afterward, looking for it both in his hand and in the pocket of his waistcoat, not a farthing could be found. That was a direct evidence that she possessed the character of a witch. Then corroborative evidence came, one man testified that a black pig came to him one day in his kitchen, though all the doors were shut, and spoke to him. Mrs. Bishop could not explain it, and that was against her. Another man made a solemn oath his whole room was light as day, though at midnight, and he felt in his soul that Mrs. Bishop was near him, troubling him. Next day, when he accused her of causing the unusual light she did not deny it, though she was very angry. And the woman was put to death June 10, 1692.

That is evidence enough. Of course, there might be more. Each person possessed of knowledge that the accused had ever admitted the exercise of powers beyond the scope of the natural would but fix conviction the more securely. No lawyer would be permitted to cross-examine, certainly not to make an argument. The nature of the case, under law, would not permit that. And when sentence was pronounced, nothing could be done but the execution of the law. The victim could be taken to any public place and either burned or hanged. If statute laws should be found to have so modified the common law as to demand a private execution, then the Haymarket or the lake front could not be selected as the final scene. But the culprit must be put to death in the prison yard, with less than fifty spectators, including physicians and reporters.

And so a woman or man might legally be hanged or even burned—or both—for witchcraft in Chicago.

The above is a good illustration of the ignorance, intolerance and superstition of a past age. That there is a fragment of barbarism still remaining in Chicago, is illustrated by the late attempt to impose a license on mediums.

MISDIRECTED WARNING.

In No. 382 of The Progressive Thinker, spirit Horace Greeley, through Wm. E. Bonney warns the millionaires and multimillionaires of the United States against the continued accumulation of the wealth of the country for their own selfish gratification, while millions of wealth producers are suffering for the necessaries of life. The facts as stated are true; but the warning is misdirected. It will not be heeded. It is hardly in nature that it should. The French King nor nobility nor priesthood tore down the Bastille, nor did the slaveholders of our own country cease their encroachments upon human rights until compelled to do so by force of arms. But why appeal to the robber classes in this case? Why try to call off the wolves from their sport with the sheep?

So long as the people see fit to act the part of the sheep, they will find—yes, even develop, sports enough to play with them. The people at the present time have every power to protect themselves. They have the free use of the ballot, and generally a fair count. All that they lack is intelligence and manhood.

Millionaires—no matter how multi—as such are really the most helpless of mortals. The forces of Nature, all the time work against the accumulation of material wealth. Labor increases production, prevents decay by consumption and reproduction, makes titles in law to property, natural or artificial, and hands them over to the cunning, the greedy and the heartless ones whom we call millionaires and invest with all the known powers of oppression that they possess. We elect their creatures to the positions of power; fight sham battles for their diversion, and piteously pray as to a God for especial relaxation of severity in time of extra trouble. Let us change the program. "Right about face" in this march towards the terrible revolution foretold. You have made these conditions, you have made the millionaires.

When you build necessary roads, do not use any hocus-pocus of law or logic to convey the ownership of them to a person or a clique for their profit—this is another millionaire breeder.

Stop paying more for public service than it is necessary to pay.

To correct the great inequalities that have already been made, enforce a graduated tax upon all property above a moderate amount, so as to restore a nearer approach to normal conditions.

TRUE WOMANHOOD.

Classic features that seem to thrill
With a halo each furrowed line
Silently portray loves secret will
And a soul divine.

Brow whose sun is in eclipse
Yet tranquil, sweet and kind—
Angels pause and stoop to kiss
One so rich in mind.

Time his fetters can only bind
With a nameless bond
What in seeming it can but find—
The soul has gone beyond.

Power it has to live apart,
Undefiled and pure,
With a true and loving heart
To suffer and endure.

In the eyes, sad and deep,
Mirrored from above,
Do the arching heavens keep
All her brooding love,

Bending every thought and will
To the highest good,
And in gentle acts fulfill
Her true womanhood.

PETER AND PAUL.

SOME THOUGHTS FOR SPIRITUALISTS TO CONSIDER—GIVE UNTO CAESAR THE THINGS THAT ARE CAESAR'S—BUT LET US BE WISE AND ROB NOT PETER TO PAY PAUL.

To the Editor:—Owing to circumstances over which I have had little or no control, my pen has been kept silent for a long time; nor would I dare lift it now for public use but for the fact that I realize the cause we love so dearly demands it. By carefully reading the grand old Progressive Thinker, I see that the great lights of the world still furnish its pages with pen-flashes which carry with them thoughts that live and breathe. And yet, occasional errors creep in, tending to mislead, consequently serve to prejudice inexperienced minds against over-looked facts, and thus prove detrimental to the cause of Spiritualism.

For some time the cry has gone forth against fraudulent dealings of persons posing themselves as mediums for spiritual phenomena in its various phases. There are those who, no doubt, possess just enough of the peculiar qualities known as mediumship, which, combined with legerdemain, can cause much sensation among the credulous. The same parties, being not Spiritualists in fact, but prompted by greed and dishonest motives, use the two forces conjointly to carry out their selfish ends regardless of consequences to spirit or mortal, and thus temporarily bring into disrepute the grandest cause ever vouchsafed to human kind.

But while this is true, Spiritualism also is a fact—a momentous, irrefutable fact. Though it came unsought, uncalled by human voice, it came in response to a deeply felt demand in mortals' inner life. It came because the world was ripe for it. Spiritualism has its mediums—genuine mediums through which it reaches mortals. It has its two sides—its physical and mental or phenomenal and philosophical phases—the two grand divisions that characterize all life—all nature. And if we, as students of its nature, its uses and blessings, would be successful, we must receive and study it in the way of its coming.

The phenomenal facts of Spiritualism, like those of all other great questions presented for man's consideration, form the only true basis for scientific expression. Phenomena first, because the world into which we are born is a world of phenomena. Our senses connect us immediately with it, and by this touch the inner man is reached, thought induced, which culminates in philosophy. These two cardinal features in Spiritualism, like matter and spirit, are the two halves making the one perfect whole. They are by nature inseparably blended, and form the external and the internal of all being—all things. Hence, he who fancies that he can attain to the crowning glory of spiritual being minus its phenomenal constituents will find himself, when he gets there, like Milton's man minus woman, "but half made up." Let us, then, try to be wise in our investigations, and knowing that it was not ours, but the wisdom of the angel world that introduced to mortals the phenomena of Spiritualism as the key note to the grand science of life, can we not trust to them in closing the portals when a sufficiency of phenomena has been given for the purpose intended? For rest assured, dear reader, that it is not the phenomena, but the abuse of it, that constitutes the evil thereof. As well attempt to drop the a b c's, when you learn to write history, or to solve mathematical problems, omitting the use of numbers, as to solve the problem of life without its phenomena. I have dwelt upon this point, because of the need of a broader knowledge of phenomenal Spiritualism among Spiritualists themselves, and that, learning its sacredness, they may refrain from dealing it out in a manner too disgusting to invite further investigation.

I will now call attention to some of our most brilliant writers whose articles have enriched the pages of The Progressive Thinker with the sunshine of Spiritualism and the prospects of a grander future. The articles to which I am about to call your attention are specially pointed in a way of inquiry as to how we are to deal with the phenomenal mediums, and their connection with what is too frequently styled "phenomena-hunters," or still worse "wonder-hunters." And if, in my touching on those most excellent contributions in their general tenor, I am found to be a little critical on some points, I will try to be as gentle in words as the Angel of St. John in his instruction how to deal with the angels of the seven churches of Asia, and speak nothing harder than the words: "I have somewhat against thee." The first I call to notice is from the pen of our noble Sister, Mrs. R. S. Lillie, as quoted by Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten from some one of the American Spiritual papers and put into the columns of The Progressive Thinker, the date and number of which I have forgotten. This paper has been well read and highly approved by strong minds and referred to as the criterion for future action; and yet I cannot see that it fills wholly its intended purpose. Her words touching the case of our good Brother Lyman C. Howe develop facts deplorable enough, and none realize it more than myself. For I am personally acquainted with Brother Howe, and have listened with ecstacy to the outpourings of his great soul, and can say that, as an inspirational lecturer he has but few peers, as I see it; and with Sister Lillie I may say, "What does it mean?" But not just as she, for I know what it means. Brother Howe in his line of thought is far in advance of his time, and like the immortal Thomas Paine, his day of honors is in the waiting future. But as to "The platforms of hundreds of meeting-places over the land being supplied with an inferior order of intellectuality because, as some of the managers say 'It doesn't matter as long as we are going to have tests,'" why, if such be true, and Sister Lillie say it is, then it shows clearly that the people of said places are not ready for the philosophy of Spiritualism, but are ready for "tests," because as yet they look through the senses only: that is all, and Sister Lillie with myself and others must await their intellectual development. Brain cannot be legislated nor beaten into human craniums, and it would seem a little unkind, would it not, to censure such for being brainless, all things being considered?

Again if it is true, and it is so claimed by Sister Lillie, that our speakers employed are in fact of an inferior order of intellectuality, then it is a sad commentary on them and the managers. The only mistake I see in the matter is, Sister Lillie and headmirers have overestimated the intellectual gravity of the age, and look for too much.

In concluding this reference, I will say I heartily concur with Sister Lillie, that "Spiritualists should contribute to the upbuilding of Spiritualism and what it represents." I further agree that "time and place" are two primary factors in establishing order and success in our cause which, it seems, the good angels have seen fit to reveal and put into our keeping through the two special classes of their agents, namely, phenomenal and inspirational mediums. But we must remember that Spiritualism is a thing of evolutionary process and must conform to the law of growth; let us therefore learn to labor and wait.

The next brilliant star to which I call attention is Sister Emma Hardinge Britten, whose name is familiar to every tongue of the civilized world. From Sister Britten's own statements she is a medium both for the phenomenal and the inspirational phases of Spiritualism. And I am only too glad to repeat her words touching the nature of mediumship. Speaking of phenomenal "tests," such as prove the identity and presence of departed friends by giving names, age and tokens of personality, Sister Britten wisely remarks: "These can only be rendered when certain organs of the medium's brain can be influenced by the communicating spirit." This is a fact of too vast importance to let drop with a mere passing notice. Every investigator of spiritual phenomena should know it, as it is a law of the physiology of the brain that every organ has its special vibratory motion, hence its special function, for intelligence can manifest only according to brain—organic adaption—memory serves to tell of events, proper names of individual titles, while reason gives us logic, etc. This truth once thoroughly understood, thousands of apparent discrepancies in spirit communication are easily and readily accounted for; and without said knowledge, never can be. Sister Britten further remarks: "The ideas desired to be impressed upon the brain organs of inspired public speakers are of a totally different nature to those which recall names, ages, dates, etc., under the influence of communicating spirit friends, and the attempt to act upon the two different brain exercises would not only be impossible, but ruinous to the integrity of the medium's capacity." Truer words were never written—they cannot be too highly estimated or too closely studied. Every honest medium should make them a lesson of daily study until they shall have mastered the situation; then, and not till then, are they ready to deal out phenomena from the public rostrum. Honest investigators should study the same lessons. It will reconcile to the judgment of the honest thinker many statements made by communicating spirits, which would otherwise be wholly incredible, if not disgusting. As to "Smart Alecks," and theological nincompoops, they should never be allowed to sit in seances until they learn the first principles of self-respect. To grant it would be "casting pearls before swine."

Now, what Sister Britten has said of the law of mediumship touching these phenomenal phases is practically applicable to every phase from the tiny rap to the crowning materializations of personal forms—yea, even the highest grade of inspirational messages. And when Spiritualists learn and bring these truths into practice, there will be no more crying out against fraudulent dealing of "bad managers, phenomena-hunters, and low orders of intellectual speakers."

Again, Sister Britten urges the necessity of "Spiritualists everywhere to live better and purer lives than those of our general earthly career, for the sake of preparing for the mighty change called death." Transition is a better word, and to live thus for the present life is still better. Yet, these words come like gems dropped from wisdom-spheres. Only last night, at our materializing seance, a sweet spirit-daughter, Jennie Belle, spoke almost verbatim those words. Pardon this little episode. I, too, heartily concur with Sister Britten's instruction. Too many Spiritualists, seeing that the bottom is kicked out of h—l, the Devil absconded, and gnawing worms with their gnashing teeth and sulphurous paraphernalia are but the waning shadows of superstition and myth, have, in their ecstacies, allowed themselves to become too heedless of their high privileges and the divine mission of their being, respectively.

Once more: Sister Britten remarks, "I am a Spiritualist simply upon the proofs of spirit return afforded solely by spiritual phenomena." And further, "I insist now, as I have done for the last thirty years, that no one has ever absolutely known of spiritual existence beyond the grave, or the fact that death is of the body alone, and does not touch—much less quench the spirit—until the proofs are given, in the phenomena of modern, no less than in ancient Spiritualism." These words are more weighty than gold. They should be chiseled on the door-fronts of every court-house, every temple and church-house throughout the lands of Christian paganism, until the hearts of all people become open for the reception of "knocks," even the "spirit knockings," as they are called. Such words coming from the source they did, should ever put a seal upon the mouths of blatant quasi-Spiritualists who seek in vain the high privilege of rostrum service, and are ever crying, "The world doesn't need phenomenal Spiritualism"—at the same time not knowing themselves the a b c of Spiritualism, either in its phenomena or its philosophy. I also agree with Sister Britten's statement that "the two distinct and wholly inseparable phases of our glorious revelation ought to be carefully and religiously guarded." Also, that the best results for proof of the presence of departed loved ones, for new investigators, is to be found or "had at the home circle," rendered sacred by that confidence that flows from living harmonious lives, and the ceaseless aspirations for a better knowledge of life to-day and a grander to-morrow.

I am also strongly in favor, that, when it is deemed wise or advisable to hold public meetings (especially such as our annual camp-meetings) for "tests," that only alleged test mediums having been thoroughly proved capable and worthy of such positions should be chosen by the managers of said gatherings to serve on such occasions." But I am opposed to curtailing the rights and opportunities of mediums only partially developed in their powers, or perhaps, because their only phase is the tiny "rap," or moving of articles without visible contact, etc., and therefore are spoken of with words disrespectful of their gifts. Nothing in nature is without its use. Everything has its cause—even becomes a cause and has or should have its time and place as well as purpose. Let us learn to be tender with these, and help to develop and educate; for are we not all members of the great family of Humanity?

Now, while I have expressed myself thus approvingly of those living, breathing expressions of Sister Britten, I must, as John was instructed to write unto the angel of the church of Ephesus, conclude by saying to this grand woman: "I have somewhat against thee." Not that I oppose the "Seventh" day of the week being regarded by Spiritualists with all due respect, as all other days should be. But I do think that Sister Britten's singling out this special day (seventh day of the week) which she says, "is so universally devoted by all other religionists, of custom in centuries," and declares it a shame and a scandal" that said day "Should be desecrated amongst Spiritualitsts," smacks a little of the superstitions of the past. For does not Sister Britten know that the seventh day of the week being held more sacred than any other day is a grape that will set children's teeth on edge one sprang from the soil of superstition and ignorance of a handful of the children of one Heber, guided and directed by one Moses, who, though said to be learned in all the Egyptian skill, was the very meanest of mean men; and for his "God" erroneously took "Jehovah"—Jah-Weh—a departed spirit of an Egyptian disappointed aspirant to some lucrative or ecclesiastical office, and was so devoid of the common morality of men, that during his Lordship over Moses and his little flock, he made himself the participeps criminis of all that is known to the calendar of crime? And does she not know, too, that every day of the week is held equally sacred with the "Seventh" by some religious sect or other; and, that in each and every case the act of making one day more sacred, divine or "Holy" than any one of the other six, is the result of pure ignorance of both God, man and nature? The very idea, to use a vulgar phrase, "Smell" too much of time-honored claims minus the honor.

Let us as Spiritualists learn to appreciate Time as one of the primary factors in our being, and try to cultivate and improve our talent—our whole being, respectively, each day and all days, regardless of name or title; and by thus doing we will not only be the better angels ourselves "Over there," but we will leave the world the better for our having lived in it. This is my religion.

STOLEN GOODS ARE RECOVERED, THROUGH A DREAM.

To the Editor:—Doubtless the following facts may be of interest to investigators who read The Progressive Thinker, as showing that our spirit friends retain an interest in those still struggling in mortal life. As a result of a dream (or vision) burglarized goods were recovered. Within the past week the following facts have appeared in the St. Paul dailies. In Plainview—a small town six miles from Redwing—formerly lived a man named Gibbs, and his wife. The man having died some time ago, and the widow not wishing to occupy the house alone, closed it up, leaving furniture and fixtures, and taking up her residence with friends at a distance of several miles from Plainview.

Recently the residence of Dr. Robinson in Redwing was burglarized of considerable valuable property, consisting of silver ware and jewelry. Detectives failed to obtain any clue to the whereabouts of the stolen goods, or the burglars; but subsequently Mrs. Gibbs reported she had dreamed her husband's spirit appeared to her, and informed her that their house at Plainview had been broken into and the furniture greatly disturbed. This so strongly impressed her that she determined to investigate, and though laughed at for considering a dream she persisted in sending messengers to Plainview, who found the premises broken into and the furniture in much confusion, and as a result of their investigations discovered a considerable portion of Dr. Robinson's stolen goods secreted in the drawers of the bureau. Doubtless the parties to this burglary were aware of the circumstances and conditions under which this house stood closed and considered it a safe place of deposit for their ill-gotten gains until the excitement incident to the burglary had subsided. As a further result of the dream, a Mrs. Latha, of Winona, was arrested on the 27th as an accomplice, in whose possession was found a portion of the stolen goods. M. T. C. FLOWER.

FRAUDS! FRAUDS!!

AND SOME INTERESTING REFLECTIONS THEREON.

We are living in an age of frauds; frauds in trade, in social relations, in politics and religion; an inheritance, the result of false teaching in regard to man's duties and responsibilities. When it is known that every act carries with it its penalties, its consequences (except by restitution or righting the wrong) the world will be the better for it. But the most stupendous and far-reaching fraud was concocted in the third century. Previous to that time there were no settled opinions on religious matters; no books or formula of any kind; not a scrap of original writing of the apostles has been discovered. Various authors had written essays on religious subjects; from these and traditions they worked out the plan by which we are to be saved.

For a beginning, the heathen myth of the creation, the Garden of Eden, the fall of man; then [illegible] to save him, and at the same [illegible] ject him to be dependent on [illegible] of him who should be at the h[illegible] of this scheme, as it was customary in those days for gods to be born of virgins.

Those monks adopted the Jewish Bible. To make it harmonize and have the proper connection they must select a Jew, and claim his descent from God, a man not known or mentioned by historians of his time. Pontius Pilate never knew him, a fact the Christians vainly tried to remedy, going so far as to interpolate a passage in Josephus, a Jewish historian of that time. The description given Jesus fits very well a noted reformer and moralist living at that time, and going about doing good, and spoken of by numerous writers of that day, but he never was accused of cursing a figtree for not bearing fruit out of season, nor of coming with a sword, or ordering all to hate their father and mother, and follow him.

Geology had not then revealed that man had lived on the earth for untold ages and developed from a very low savage to the civilization of the present, and that he fell upwards instead of downwards. We have passed two stages in the plan; now we (the monks) will fix it so we can control the human race; make them build our houses and churches, pay tithes to us, or we won't ferry them over into paradise.

They had this son of God hand to St. Peter the keys of heaven and hell; whoever he shall bind, shall be bound; and whoever he sets free, shall be free, and by a hocus-pocus arrangement they managed to provide a successor to St. Peter with the same authority, and perpetually hold man in a bondage more terrible than any physical bondage earth ever saw.

Under this state of things the human race lived, fought, groveled in darkness and poverty for a thousand years. The church absorbed everything they could lay their hands upon. If anyone dared to assert anything contrary to the established rules, he suffered death. If I believed in the Devil (which I do not) I would think he had a hand in the cursed thing.

In the course of time, through the evolution of the human mind, through the outsprings of its God-given instincts, people rebelled, and the Reformation was the result. But how much did they reform? They cut loose from the Pope, but held on to the monks' frauds, and burned heretics with glee, and the same old shibboleth is still used in back villages like this—believe or be damned!

The reformed church is still trying to control the human mind to conform to their ideas, making a regular siege on the tender minds of our little children, teaching those superstitions; making a belief in certain doctrines more than conduct or morality; trying to force their ideas by law. A petition is out to prohibit all amusements on Sunday, a day instituted by the murderer, Constantine, who adopted it to entice the pagan sunworshipers to Christianity. He murdered his mother and family because they could not entirely forget their pagan customs, a day not sanctioned by the Bible.

God never rested; he works always. In him we live, move and have our being. He works in the trees and flowers, and in man. One day's rest would throw all things in confusion and death to all living beings, therefore no day was hallowed above the rest.

Another fraud is the religious revivals, now happily ignored by the intelligent community, except as a curiosity. The fanatics go at it systematically, fix their minds and thoughts weeks beforehand on the object to be attained, ignorant of the law by which mind controls mind; but experience has taught them the fact, and they call it the work of the Lord. Why do they call for evangelists? Do they make the matter plainer, or give any more clear statements? They only work in harmony with the law of hypnotism; the Lord has nothing to do with it. It is sorrowful to see such zeal and faithful efforts wasted, when useful instruction could be given on the proper duties of man to his fellow-man. No community can be benefited by believing a falsehood.

"I LOVE YOU."

"I love you," she said, with a sigh
That went to the angels on high,
'Twas the voice of her soul so sad,
But it reached a soul and made glad
The life of another—a mate—
That knelt at the door of his fate,
Imbued with a love heaven-born,
And pure as a beautiful morn.
"I love you"—and in my soul dwells
Hope that conquers—a voice that tells
Of bright, happy days yet to be,
When thou wilt return unto me,
And bring sweetest greetings once more—
Love's salutations o'er and o'er—
Enshrined in that silence that needs
But the touch of the spirit it feeds.

Thoughts Illustrating the Status of Spiritualism, and the Dangers that Beset the Honest Investigator.

PACIFIC COAST SCINTILLATIONS.

SOME STARTLING ASSUMPTIONS BY CHARLES DAWBARN.

A Highly Interesting and Valuable Page for the Consideration of Thinking Minds.

A CALIFORNIA PHILOSOPHER STARTLES THE WORLD WITH THOUGHTS OF DEEP IMPORTANCE TO EVERY SPIRITUALIST—HE ADVANCES ON TO A NEW PLANE, WITH THEORIES AND CONCLUSIONS STARTLING IN THEIR NATURE, AND WHICH WILL BE READ WITH THRILLING INTEREST.

To my brother and sister thinkers:—Finding myself with an article in my brain demanding to be released, I will, by way of preface, or, if you please, as a text, tell you something of the experiences of an English clergyman who has recently published a work which he calls "The Great Secret, or the Modern Mystery of Spiritualism." The author is both a clergyman and a shrewd man of the world, and apparently free from the prejudices that usually attach themselves to the man in a pulpit. He is evidently a man of great talent, having gained a fellowship in his college, and for many years occupied the position either of editor or editorial writer for the daily press of London. At the same time he has been the rather popular preacher at various churches, though always noted for his tendency to speak kindly of the "Modern Mystery."

AS A WRITING MEDIUM.

His experiences commenced with the development of his wife as a writing medium, through whom, from time to time, he received such tests as delight the heart of the worshiper of phenomena. He also seems to have made the acquaintance of almost every public medium who has at any time been high priest or priestess of the Occult, to the worthy citizens of London. And he has apparently been a welcomed visitor to the homes and seances of every distinguished investigator or full-fledged believer in that city during the forty years of which he writes. He has included hypnotism in his investigations, and has been successful both as operator and subject. He has even dabbled a little in "Black Magic," at least sufficient to prove it a dread reality. So we have in this author a man most unusually qualified to deal intelligently with the subject. That he is now, and has for almost all these years been a believer is evident, for he narrates incidents and proofs which would carry conviction to every intelligent and unprejudiced mind. But his trouble has been that of every experienced investigator. He has not only witnessed much phenomena that could be explained as due to the normal or abnormal powers of the mortal, but where there has been an evident "ghost" at work, mistakes, and at times evident fraud, have troubled his ecclesiastical soul.

So we have little but the usual mixed experiences of the average intelligent investigator. A grain of is claimed by the Spiritualist as abundant compensation for the toil and trouble of long years of waiting upon the "dear spirits." And to some minds perhaps it is. But to others there has ever been fierce attempt to increase the crop of truth. And it is herein that the experiences of this clergyman become interesting to every truth-lover the world over. He, as we have said, had had abundant experience in both public and private seances, but his pathway to progress seemed blocked. He was just as liable to the usual imperfections of spirit intercourse after many years of such investigations, as in his very first sittings with his own wife and a few chosen friends. So the question became: "Is progress possible?" And to solve this he tried an experiment which inspires the present writer to call this attention to his book. For, as we have seen, the rest was what almost everybody can endorse, and say "me too." He determined to seek spirit intercourse from the highest plane possible to the mortal, so that if there be truth to the maxim "like to like" he might attract the very highest, and repel those who come from the unseen to trouble and perplex weary mortals. He devoted a house to that purpose. Not merely were there rooms for use by mediums and circles of investigators or believers, but a chapel was prepared where he himself conducted a religious service twice a week, and it was at the conclusion of this service that a special seance was held by the believers present. The surroundings were most solemn. Frivolity was conspicuous only by its absence. The spirits had promised great results. For over a year at one time, and for months at others, these meetings were continued. But no promise was fulfilled. Prayers to God for light and truth proved no more efficacious than the eternal "Nearer my God to thee" of the usual public seance, with its miscellaneous crowd.

ONE GRAIN OF WHEAT.

So our poor clergyman has his one grain of wheat after forty years of honest attempt to make at least a pint of it. He clings to that atom of truth with his whole soul, but his earnest attempt at progress has proved a life-long failure, although, apparently, every condition was favorable to success. Since such is the experience of the thousands, once zealous, who have become "silent" believers from the same cause, we may well ask: Is Modern Spiritualism fixed and bounded like the theological systems of the past and present? Is there no hope of solving its problems, overcoming its barriers, and reaching a higher manhood on this side of the life line? Is the honest and convinced investigator to presently become discouraged, almost as a matter of course?

I know there are many to whom the possibility of an hour's chat with any spirit is of itself abundant satisfaction. Like the average churchmember, they are content, as they would say, to let well enough alone. But even the pulpit has become a truthseeker, and impatient of the limitations of the past. It criticises its own authorities and its own teachings as never before. In other words, it is progressing. Can Modern Spiritualism say and do the same? Unless its truthseekers can be introduced to congenial souls from the higher life, and protected from the threshold spirit, intelligent believers will continue to forsake its gatherings. Its one great truth of "demonstrated human immortality" will be absorbed by the churches, and from lack of anything higher to offer, the cult will gradually disappear. What are the possibilities for the believer in Modern Spiritualism? Can he hope for anything higher than has been reached after forty years of honest effort by the author of this work.

The present writer hopes to offer a satisfactory reply to such questions. His experiences have been similar to those of this clergyman, and therein lies the motive of the article now demanding exit from his brain.

FULL OF PERPLEXITIES.

That Modern Spiritualism is full of perplexities and uncertainties every student discovers for himself, sooner or later. The joy with which he welcomes an assured test at one interview is often clouded by misstatement at the next. He finds that telepathy and clairvoyance explain many a good test claimed as spirit return. But as there are a sufficient number of his experiences which admit of no other explanation than the presence of intelligences who once were mortals like himself, he rejoices in the knowledge of human immortality, and avows himself a Spiritualist. It is here that a great majority of investigators rest. The seance, whether public or private, brings them messages and tests. Those who mourn declare themselves comforted. In trouble they look to the invisible for wise counsel. In sickness they seek a spirit prescription. Above all they each desire to become a medium, and through weary weeks and months seek development. Some succeed; others fail. The life force of one can be used for physical manifestations. In another the influence must be entirely mental. Here and there is one whose mediumship seems to be a blessing to himself and others. But for the most part there is a developed sensitiveness which leaves the medium the sport of the conditions. Heaven, perhaps, to-day, and then hell for a week to come. With his self-protection destroyed it is usually "woe betide" the poor sensitive who becomes a public instrument through which a spirit shall attempt to reach a mortal, for, in most cases, mortal and spirit are alike on the plane of self.

PHENOMENA OR CHURCH PEWS.

Another class of believers, who have usually failed in development as mediums, either settle down as worshipers of phenomena, or else carry themselves and their beliefs into the church pew, and boast of the liberal views of their preacher.

UNPROVED PHENOMENA.

But there is a residuum; those who have grown heavy-hearted over the unsatisfactory test and the unproved phenomena, or to whom even the best test has become wearisome. They hunger for truth. They want the problems solved, the mysteries explained. They care nothing for tests. Physical phenomena seem to be unprogressive. They have already proved human immortality, and now they crave fellowship with advanced intelligences. Each demands the truth for himself, otherwise it is but a return to the old system of "thus saith the Lord," uttered by somebody who claims to be his mouthpiece. Nearly all, like the learned author of "The Great Secret" find an impassable barrier. They are not victims of mortal fraud. The family circle may have been an altar dedicated to truth and purity. The medium may have been wife, daughter or son. Every known or suspected inharmony has been eliminated, and yet there is no progress. Phenomena in plenty, but Truth wears a veil, and little of real value is received. After years of such experience the believer finds he knows no more of God and man and the mystery of life than he did in the beginning.

INTERESTING EXPERIENCES.

I propose to now give some of the experiences of one believer for whom I can vouch, but which experiences were merely an echo of the wasted years of thousands as earnest as himself, until he, but a few months ago, found a way over or through the barrier which he had found so long impassable. For a score of years he had been true to his convictions, endeavoring to reduce all belief to a basis of provable facts. His own sensitiveness permitted spirit approach, and sometimes the heavens had seemed to open to shower blessings on his soul. But foes came as readily as friends whenever the gate was ajar, so that, for the most part, safety compelled him to avoid personal experience of spirit return. The active mind offers poor foothold to any spirit, so he accepted public office and labored zealously for the public weal. But at intervals the experiences reappeared, and it seemed as if the battle had to be fought all over again. He failed to find any direct cause which might account for the presence of his foes. But they seemed to have certain gathering points. For instance, he could rarely visit a public library to select a book but that he would be followed and annoyed for hours by some "invisible," seeking to control him. It is true each battle, when fought to victory, was usually followed by a brief and happy but the sense of danger made him only the more earnest to close the door to all spirit return. His method of fighting off the influence was to resolutely fix his mind on some matter of interest in his daily affairs. And this would, sooner, or later, prove successful every time. Any attempt to gain help from the spirit side of life only seemed to give added power to the foe.

RE-UNION WITH ANGEL FRIENDS,

His last experience was rather remarkable. He had passed a most enjoyable evening at a private entertainment given by a local society. In the middle of the night he suddenly woke up and found himself praying to the Holy Virgin, and invoking various saints. It was an hour or more before he could throw off the influence, which at last left only after asserting its power to return at any time. This, as I have said, was his last experience, and left him depressed, for the cause of such an attack was impossible to discover. No Catholic had been in his company during the evening, nor had he read or even thought anything that might have opened the door. Still it is now six months since that battle, nor has he experienced the slightest annoyance from that time to the present. The spirit world has opened to him as never before. And herein lies the motive of this article, for my readers will naturally ask what further experience came to him by which he was thus freed from his foes, and gained happy access to his friends. The answer involves a chapter in the philosophy which I fear may be considered dull and uninteresting by such of my readers as are worshipers of phenomena.

SEVERAL CONSCIOUSNESSES.

The assertion that manhood consist of personal consciousness with certain powers of expression will not be disputed. But such a definition only partially covers the ground, for the fact that man has several distinct consciousnesses, blending with each other, hardly to-day permits of dispute. If we would hope to understand anything of our own manhood these must be taken into account. First there is the animal consciousness. In this the child usually dwells, and many a man for the most part of his life passes his life. It is the realm of appetite and the desire for sensuous gratification. It is the foundation of mortal manhood, glorying in the exhibition of physical strength and brute force. It is as incarnated self that man the animal stands supreme. But this phase of manhood gradually rises into and blends with an "intellectual consciousness" that of itself leaves him still but a higher animal. When this intellectual consciousness is fully unfolded his chief pleasures are those of the mind instead of the body. Out of his social and personal necessities he elaborates a system of morals and religion, which he modifies as he advances. He discovers and makes use of the forces of Nature, and becomes a powerful man, but remains himself limited by his refusal or incapability to investigate anything he cannot see, hear, taste or touch. This he calls "using his reason," and he glorifies his own limitations by the title of "common sense." So we have man the animal, and man the thinker, in a body apparently somewhat independent of them both. As an animal he is inferior to many others. As the thinker he has gained the supremacy, but only holds it by perpetual vigilance against his foes, visible and invisible. This he calls "scientific investigation and practical application."

THIS TWOFOLD MAN

has begun to make serious enquiry whether there may not be yet a third consciousness, with a reason and common sense of its own, different in many respects from those of man the animal and man the thinker. He has found in himself occasional manifestations of a faculty or faculties which he can neither analyze nor define. Intuition perplexes him. He sometimes sees without eyes, and hears without ears. And, mystery of mysteries, he finds thoughts occasionally passing to and fro without wire or postal privilege. This he calls "telepathy," and forthwith establishes a Society for Psychical Research. But the dual man who had become a Spiritualist was first in the field. He had recognized this form of consciousness as distinct from that of the intellect, and by its use had discovered that the man who died yesterday was still a near neighbor, and sometimes able to prove it. But to enter this consciousness he was compelled to leave behind much of the reason and common sense both of the animal and the thinker. Yet he discerned that here also was both a reason and a common sense which must be used under penalty of much mortification and even danger if disregarded.

So we have

that of the animal, the intellectal and the psychical. And this type of manhood has, for the most part, dominated the world of Modern Spiritualism. They have seemed steps forward in personality, but the result has often, and indeed usually, proved disheartening. The development of the psychic consciousness has not proved to be altogether the advance he had hoped. He has discovered that both the animal and the intellectual consciousness are re-embodied in the life after death, and that most of his experiences prove them essentially unchanged. He finds his holiest aspirations no safeguard against misrepresentation and deceit. He has no assurance that the genuine appearance of to-day will not be counterfeited to-morrow. The test which he once valued so highly he discovers to be no proof of identity. And he even begins to suspect that at times he may be in contact with intelligences that have had no human or mortal experience. And as he watches his fellows who have become most sensitive he sees them too often subject to obsessions which degrade their manhood. He sees investigators and believers founding societies which flourish for a time, but with the invariable result that the members either become mere worshipers of phenomena, or else become discouraged with the dull monotony of the meetings, and prefer rational sermons from radical pulpits. And it does not yet appear how welding such societies into a federation with a national head is going to overcome any of these limitations, or break down the barrier which seems to bar the way to the advantages which certainly ought to result from the development of the psychic consciousness.

PSYCHIC CONSCIOUSNESS.

Thus far my friend, whose experience I am here recording, had traveled a beaten path. Like the author of "The Great Secret," he was longing for some spiritual advance. Both alike had full and unsatisfactory experience with the psychic consciousness which apparently had opened a realm of doubt and uncertainty in almost everything save the facts of human immortality and spirit return. He had become a man with three consciousnesses, and unless he could find yet a fourth consciousness his advance was hopeless. And it is at this point that his experiences begin to be especially interesting to those of us with like aspirations.

Now let the reader imagine a mind against dogmas and faith-taught superstitions that embittered his childhood. For years he upholds reason as the only liberator of the mental slave. He carries this reason of the intellectual consciousness to the psychic realm, striving to reduce its manifestations to a so-called demonstration of natural phenomena. True to his own limitation, he upholds a Spiritualism whose communion must be soul to soul on the human level; ignoring any attempt to reach a First Cause as impossible to a finite mind. This is the man now facing a barrier apparently limiting his progress, and impassable to either his intellectual or his psychic consciousness. He determines to try an experiment and for a month silence his own reason by assuming the existence of a deity who may be reached by mortal man. It was the task of his life, as any one will discover who undertakes to silence every critical thought concerning a long-opposed dogma, but without any reason to doubt the correctness of his present views. So it happened, if anything "happens," that whilst sitting one evening silent and alone, as had long been his wont, meditating on God manifest to man, he suddenly discovered that he was unfolding a higher consciousness. What seemed a supernal glow thrilled every nerve, and imparted a strange sense of an impersonal Deity become personal to him. Life itself seemed to become deific, and a sense of divine love became almost overpowering. Naturally he suspected self-hypnotism, and looked for cause and effect to alike cease. But the morrow brought no change, and weeks and months as they passed only demonstrated that he had reached "spirit consciousness" and had found it a step in advance of the psychic, with the old barrier disappeared forever.

ALMOST FIERCELY STRUGGLING

THIS SENSE OF DIVINE LOVE, which at first was homogeneous, as if it were the all in all, commenced, as Herbert Spencer would say, to differentiate. It began to make demands upon him which must be heeded. Here were the old annoyances that had proved so disheartening, and even dangerous from the psychic level, passed and gone. But the psychic realm was as real as ever. It simply seemed now to be approached from the side of the spirit instead of the astral. The spirit was supreme, claiming its home in every human being, but demanding recognition before immortality can be assured, and asserting that the next life is itself but astral and limited unless this divine or spirit consciousness be unfolded. This Divine Spirit inhering thus to humanity claims to be ever-present, but to so respect the inherent selfhood of every mortal as to patiently wait until the human ego, by its own will power and aspiration unfolds the higher consciousness, either in this life or the next. Then comes a sense of "sonship," which may be called the "Christ plane" where God and man meet. And with this discovered filial relation is opened an inexhaustible supply from a Divine storehouse. What is generally understood as prayer is thus as impossible to my friend as ever. He simply says: "Here is my father's inexhaustible supply. As a son I have the privilege and right to this abounding love and this universal life force." And presently the glow of health blending with Divine love is consciously infused throughout his system. But it is here that the "God within" commences his demands. And at this point the reader must once again turn back briefly to the philosophy of human consciousness.

All consciousness

IS A QUESTION OF VIBRATION.

Let a pendulum oscillate some eighty times a second and a sound is produced. If only the movement be sufficiently increased we have light instead of sound. Our bodily senses express only the effects of material vibration. And our thoughts, whatever their source, can only express themselves through the vibration of matter. The animal consciousness works amidst matter whose vibration is comparatively slow. The intellectual consciousness dealing with the finer forces of Nature finds its satisfaction on a higher level, but for the most part limits its grasp to matter vibrating at the level of mortal sense.

THE PSYCHIC CONSCIOUSNESS

is sensitive to matter vibrating beyond the range of the merely intellectual. It sees without mortal eyes, and hears without mortal ears. And it discoveres that human life is existing amidst matter in this state of vibration. But just as these several states of consciousness, blend and overlap into each other, so the psychic finds itself at times, and imperfectly enough at the best, in contact with matter in vibration so far beyond its own normal experience that it can do little more than realize that here is human intelligence, but expressing itself amidst vibrations that seem to permit almost the sublime. It seems as if vibrations of the ether had been reached amidst which the emancipated soul finds powers of expression that are "god-like" to the limited mortal. This is the sphere of spirit consciousness which I believe my friend has entered, and which is, of course, equally accessible to every other mortal. But the all-important point to remember is that all states of consciousness are reached by thought, and in no other way. Thought seems to be the power of the soul expressed in vibration. Thus the sensual thought vibrates into the animal sphere, with all its passions and terrible limitations. Let the soul think to the brute and it becomes brutal. If the thought be purely intellectual its vibrations permit no approach to the psychic realm. But it is quite possible to blend both animal and intellectual thought with the psychic consciousness; and herein is its limitation. For intelligences seeking expression in such vibrations are eager to make contact with the mortal. Consciousness of the spirit, which is far higher in its vibration, must also be reached by mortal thought. But it demands that the thought be chastened, purified and concentrated before the mortal can climb thitherward.

IMITATIONS AND PERSONATIONS.

It is true that bright spirits have at times succeeded in penetrating the darkness of mortal life for a brief hour. Many an investigator has been thus favored, only to find his experience followed by imitations and personations nearer his own level of thought. He must himself by the power of thought vibrate into the consciousness where bright spirits dwell if he would hope for the blessings that, for the most part, are only latent to-day in Modern Spiritualism.

THOUGHT AND SPIRIT VIBRATION.

So my friend had, in obedience to this law of Nature, vibrated by his thought to a spirit level which he found pervaded by an intense consciousness of the Divine presence personal to each spirit, and recognized by all as the life amidst which each "lives and moves and has his being." He found himself invited to a table where everything his soul craved was in eternal plentitude—but only on a certain condition. The Divine love had prepared the feast from all eternity, but he, the soul, must himself hold his thought to the spirit vibration or he would first find his appetite gone, and presently even the table would vanish and the Divine love itself become once again imperceptible to the soul. Everything he receives he must distribute. The love, the health, the strength, in short the Divine fullness he receives only as a channel, and can himself sense the blessings only as they are flowing through him to others. In this sphere thoughts are things, and he cannot think even an unkind thought of a fellow mortal without by so much beclouding his own soul. In other words, by such a thought he lowers the vibration by which he had climbed heavenward. So he finds the "God within" a taskmaster holding him by love to a lifelong struggle. His progress, like the coming tide, may ebb and flow, but it is advanced by every effort, for such is the method of spirit progress and growth of soul.

LIGHT OF THE HIGHER WISDOM.

Now I may ask my friend what he finds he has really gained, so that I may make comparison. At his highest level, he tells me, he finds himself in contact with intelligences, human like himself, claiming like experiences and offering glad brotherhood. From them comes no name, no startling test, since for the most part their knowledge of his lower life is simply the story of an aura, as told by every human soul to all who can read it. For so-called tests and phenomena such spirits must themselves descend, and this is no duty in the light of the higher wisdom. But they gladly impart knowledge and have solved for him some mysteries. And once and again they have introduced him to a grand temple where they themselves gather, amid surroundings no pen of mortal may describe.

As we have seen, the very first effect of his new experience was to close the door to those who had troubled him in the past. At times and without any request on his part they have spoken of some coming event, and offered wise counsel. And he has found himself amidst the security of a sphere of truth, instead of doubt and insincerity. They have been intensely practical, pointing to the fact as a mortal each state of consciousness is necessary to him, and each to be lived as occasion may demand, but every time and everywhere the higher is to absolutely dominate the lower. Yet by living to the higher alone there is both gain and loss. Amidst its vibrations the so-called miracles of healing are as possible to-day as in the past. And there are many on earth to-day who, casting aside the limitations of selfishness, are healing, all diseases which are subject to the law of vibration. And my friend has both experienced and wielded this thought power. But he presently found that it demanded a concentration incompatible with the use of the other consciousnesses upon which the daily life of most of us is founded. So as his present position he finds in his hours of silence a heaven on earth, which he can only express as "God manifest in the flesh." But like the careful housekeeper who purifies from the cellar to garret, he strives without evasion to utilize each state of consciousness, and by careful control of thought to still maintain his entrance to the higher realm of his own life.

The above seems to express for the most part the present change in my friend's views, but necessarily without any presentation of the special teachings offered by his angel friends. I hope it may prove sufficiently interesting to induce others to also discover their own higher consciousness.

CHARLES DAWBARN.

San Leandro, Cal.

A CRITICAL STUDY OF OBSESSION.

THE DARK SIDE OF LIFE VIVIDLY ILLUSTRATED.

SHADOWS FROM THE GHOSTLY LAND—SHAPES WHICH DROVE A YOUTH TO MADNESS — COMPELLED BY HIS PARENTS TO CONSORT WITH DEMONS — CURED BY ONE ADJUDGED AS A MAD WOMAN, BUT SHE PROVED TO BE A SPIRIT MEDIUM WITH MOST REMARKABLE POWERS.

"The charge that a man may be, under some circumstances, frightened by his shadow is not extravagant, says the Cincinnati Enquirer. The claim that he is affrighted by shadows, or things which are only seemingly terrible, nearly as often as by realities, is susceptible of proof, and therefore sound. There are men who are constantly attended by a horde of dark reflections from the most horrible images imaginable, in the light, in the darkness, in solitude and in crowds. And sometimes they are more than reflections—the images themselves, materialized and sentient."

Thus spoke Mr. William Harrington at a conference of occultists in this city, which was attended by representatives from eight cities. Mr. Harrington is a New England man, an educator, a thinker and writer, and something in the way of illustrating the idea he had so strongly expressed was expected from his ready tongue.

"I knew a man," he continued, "who by shadows was pursued to his death; by them driven to their own supposed abode, where everything is shadowy; and I have fair evidence that another person, woman, was so persistently followed by similar phantoms that they forced her into a retreat for the insane. If these agents of doom were more than shadows, and filmy ones at that, none but the victims could

DISCOVER THE FACT.

"The man I will call James Aughton, without vouching for the correctness of the name. While he was yet a boy he became acquainted with spectral things and told how it came about. He slept alone in a room occupied by no one else. Hearing unusual noises, he arose one night to find the cause, and discovered that he was accompanied in his search by shadows 'blacker than the darkness.' They followed close and imitated his movements, peering into dark corners and behind doors, and turning nervously to look over their shoulders when the direction of the noises seemed to change. Young Aughton became more nervous at these misty apparitions than at the continuance of the strange sounds, and in a panic he rushed back to bed and lay, sleepless and trembling, with his head under the covers till morning.

"How he detailed his adventure to unsuperstitious parents, begging that he might have a bedfellow or sleep elsewhere, and their refusal of the request, followed by severe castigation when he persisted, I need not dwell upon. They declared that the boy should be cured of such silliness by familiarity with its cause, rather than confirmed in it by humoring his whimsicalities, and so they forced him to occupy the belenguered room strictly by himself, as they thought.

"Whether he was 'frayed by things that be not,' or other wise, is not to the point. To his senses of sight and sound the room was filled with cruel, tormenting things—shadows from that limbo where they are carbonized to the deepest ebony shade—mocking demons that sneered at his trepidation; tormenting demons that darted down upon him from the gloom, and chuckled at his fright; fighting demons that tore and mangled and choked each other; demons with breath so hot that

THEY STIFLED THE AIR

"These were enough to make night sufficiently hideous, but there were sounds from unseen and unimaginable sources, low but distinct like the growlings and howlings of wild beasts, to add to the boy's terror, and in a few days after his first fright he showed strong signs of dementia and refused to eat, talk or attend school. His parents did not yet take the hint, but were firm in their decision that he should occupy the dreaded chamber and consort with its terrible shadows. 'Imaginary spooks' was the name applied to them by Aughton pere and Vmere; but when even the imagination peoples a room with such shapes there is sufficient occasion for alarm. The child who sees goblins in the darkness should be brought to the light at once, else things unsatisfactory to the sight will be seen more and more.

"Jimmie's parents boasted to the neighbors that they were making rapid progress in conquering the boy's stubbornness, and said it was simply his aroused self-will that kept him from eating and talking. School attendance was not of so much consequence for the time being, but no long time would elapse before he would be bent to that. He was getting along finely, and had stopped complaining, probably because he had found that the objects of his fear

WERE WHOLLY IMAGINARY.

"But he had not so found. To him they were real, and he discovered that he was the special object of their persecution; that they remitted no effort to make themselves obnoxious to him, and those annoyances which were his most decided aversion were those most frequently and monotonously repeated. There was more than enough variety, however, in these shadowy gymnastics. Sometimes they were interspersed with murders, sometimes with executions, always with tortures most agonizing, and the grosser the diabolic horror the greater the enjoyments of the participants and the terror of the mortal spectator. Through many long nights he was robbed of sleep by these antics, and they were certainly engrossing his mind all the time, whether sleeping or waking.

"He had remained silent more than six months, refusing to answer questions or in any way join in conversation, eating furtively a few mouthfuls daily, never at the family table, when one day he said to his mother:

"'I'm going to join 'em.'

"'Who, Jimmie?' she asked.

"'Why the Devil's army, that has so much fun in my room every night. If I belonged to 'em I could have as much fun as they do.'

"'Nonsense, Jimmie; the Devil has no army.'

"'I say he has, and a big one. More than 1,000 are killed every night, but the army never gets any smaller. I believe it gets larger all the time, and there must be 1,000,000 of 'em. They scare me awfully, and I'm going to join 'em and get over the scare.'

"The mother was troubled. The long silence was broken in a way quite unexpected, indicating, as the good woman thought,

A MIND DISEASED.

"She communicated her fears to her husband, who in a flippant way declared that the boy was playing crazy just to carry out his scheme and gain his point, and this plan the old gentleman declared he would defeat. The puritanic idea that every thing resembling insubordination is an unpardonable sin was a prominent factor in the mental processes of the elder Aughton, and he guarded against it in his inferiors with every carnal weapon at command. Jimmie must be disciplined, not coddled, was the substance of his conclusion.

"Jimmie became daily more intractable after these few words with his mother, and soon he expressed scorn of the parental authority by word and deed. He became blasphemous—a rank crime in his father's view, almost as sinful as insubordination— and he was chastised with most brutal severity. In the night following the boy crept silently from his chamber to his father's room and stabbed the old man in his sleep, then ran through the house shrieking and howling as if pursued by a horde of fiends. He was overtaken and secured, still fighting with shadows, raving in words as loose as heaps of sand, and scattered wide from sense, full of incoherent images reflected from that which the world calls frenzied brain, but they were more real to him than anything else in his dreary life. Who can say they were not absolutely real in that chaotic deep whither young Aughton's mind had wandered?

"The father was dangerously, but not fatally hurt. He recovered in course of time. The mother's heart was rent, from which she never recovered, and for a long period following the removal of her son to an insane retreat her life was despaired of. He was taken away from home in fetters, otherwise he would have injured himself and his attendants. Writhing, frothing and uttering terrible oaths—this was his condition when his mother's tender eyes finally

RESTED UPON HIM IN LOVE.

"I visited the asylum where he was confined when he had been there nine years or more. He was still in a straight-jacket, and, as one of the keepers remarked, 'as crazy a man as ever breathed.' It occurred to me that a spirit medium with whom I had some acquaintance might find out more about his condition than the learned doctors of the institution had been able to discover, and I made a proposition to this effect. It was pooh-poohed. No; they had all the lunatics through Spiritualism they then wanted.

"'Any through religion?' I asked.

"'Yes a few.'

"'How many of these are at present under your care?'

"After deliberating a moment one of the keepers said: 'Nine;' whereupon another corrected him by stating the number to be 'eleven,' which, after some explanation, was agreed to.

"'How many through Spiritualism?'

"There was an awkward pause, a whispered conference, and then they admitted there was only one.

"'Man or woman?'

"'Woman.'

"'What are the peculiar features of her dementia?'

"'Oh, she thinks she can talk with spirits and sometimes that she sees them?'

"'Easily managed?'

"'She's not specially troublesome.'

"'Can I see her?'

"Permission was obtained, and an interview with the lady convinced me that she saw forms and heard the voices of a delegation from the angelic host. She told me correctly some incidents in my life, mentioning details I had forgotten till they were recalled by her narrative, and she finally said that I had been prompted to visit the unfortunates in that retreat by a good spirit, and from this visit much good was promised. At a visit a few days later I managed to bring Mrs. Fogel—the demented lady—and James Aughton face to face, and thence

OCCURRED A STRANGE SCENE.

"'Why, that poor man is literally beset by demons!' exclaimed she, at her first sight of the man, 'and it's no wonder he is out of his senses. He is combative, too, without patience or rest. Must be that they want to kill him. Yes,' she mused, 'they are murderers, and seek to destroy everybody they can bring under their influences, and they even fight among themselves, and are enraged because they cannot kill each other. You do not see them? Strange. Probably they are too diaphanous for your vision, but I have seen the same kind before, and easily recognize their character. They used to come to me.'

"'How did you get rid of them?'

"'I prayed them away.'

"'To whom did you pray?'

"'To the Ever-living God. He only can answer prayer.'

"'Will you not pray in behalf of this man also.'

"'Indeed I will,' and without ceremony she kneeled upon the stone floor and supplicated God to come to the relief of Aughton and save him from the wiles of devilish spirits. Long and fervent she prayed, to the surprise and evident annoyance of the keepers, who wished to interfere, but I prevented them from doing so. An ardent manner, eloquent words and undeniable sincerity on the part of Mrs. Fogel soon impressed every one there with the importance of the effort, and its suggestions were profitable to all. At length Aughton became calmer and before the supplication was finished he gave close attention to the lady, which the keepers pronounced a good sign, as his mind had not for many years taken cognizance of anything but

HIS OWN SUFFERINGS.

He looked at her beseechingly, and for a moment a melancholy smile modified his saturnine visage.

"Next day Mrs. Fogel was requested to visit and pray with the man again, he having become more tractable after her first visit. She objected, urging that many bad spirits had called and threatened her with vengeance if she did not desist from efforts to assist Aughton by prayer, and she urged that already her burdens were too heavy for her strength.

"But finally she was persuaded to go. Aughton recognized her presence by silence and a sickly smile, and she immediately remarked upon the reduced number of shadowy beings tormenting him, saying it was a good omen. He uttered but one word:

"'Pray!' said he.

"I get this incident from one of the keepers, and give it from memory of his detail. Mrs. Fogel immediately knelt and began her supplication by thanking God for His answer to her prayer of the previous day. 'And now the disposition to vouchsafe us Almighty help is manifest,' she continued, 'attune our souls to worthiness for its reception. Not only bless us, but make us deserving of blessing—a state we can gain through Thy mercy alone.

Every day he begged for

THE VISITS OF THE LADY.

And she began to look forward to this recurring season of prayer in behalf of a fellow sufferer with genuine pleasure. The case was of such interest that I obtained permission to attend on these occasions, and I saw the gradual change of Aughton from the maniacal state to a usual condition of gentleness, with paroxysms of his old disease at long intervals. The straight-jacket was removed, and within a year from the beginning of these remarkable services the man was permitted to associate with his fellow patients for several hours daily. Previous to the prayerful effort in his behalf he could not be trusted unfettered with one of his kind for a moment for his dementia constantly impelled him to murderous acts. As sanity struggled to return, however, he grew weak, and complained of illness. Before he became helpless, a condition that soon followed, he showed a decided disposition to talk about himself and his calamitous life.

"'I hear that my father and mother are both dead,' he said to me in one of these talks. 'Poor mother! Father hurried her into the grave through his cruelty to me! He could not see the truth, and insisted that I was not haunted by fiends that sought my destruction; and thus he refused to guard me from their assaults. He was a prayerful man, and often prayed that the heathen might be rescued from the snares of the Devil, but when these snares of the Devil, but when these snares were set for his only child he would not believe it, but left me to battle alone with the powers of darkness. They were too strong for me, and I was frightened by threats of injury if I refused to submit to their will in all things. Only in part could I consent, and hence arose a till Mrs. Fogel came to my help. She drove the miscreants away, and very seldom have they dared to come back. Ah, there comes one now!' he exclaimed, pointing to a window. 'For God's sake let him not come in,' he pleaded, clutching my hand, 'for he's one of the worst in the lot. He wants me to murder Mrs. Fogel.'

"'Then we'll have him destroyed immediately,' I replied.

"'Hah! That scares him, and he has gone,' said Aughton. The paroxysm was over, and peace reigned once more. Toward the last his weakness was excessive and rarely he left his bed. Mrs. Fogel became his nurse during the day, and when she was not otherwise engaged he besought her to pray for him. She was always ready for this service, and acquitted herself to his satisfaction, much to his benefit, and largely to her own relief as well. Seeing them casually during these seasons no stranger would suspect either of mental alienation. Their conversation was not only sane and sound, but often highly instructive, and their friendship, cemented by fellowship in misfortune, was truly pathetic. They had but one point of disagreement, the subject of which may be gathered from a CONVERSATION BETWEEN THEM.

"'The spirits of your father and mother both visited me last night,' began the lady, 'and they want me to labor to induce you to forgive your father for his harsh treatment of you.'

"'I will not.'

"'But your refusal gives pain to your dear mother.'

"'Oh, father has made her say so. He always made her say what he wished her to, but she does not want anything unreasonable from me, I'm sure, and forgiveness of the man who wrecked my life would be unreasonable.'

"'You must forgive as you would be forgiven.'

"'What have I to be forgiven for?'

"'Your sins.'

"'I have not sinned knowingly.'

"'All are sinners, whether willfully or through Adam's transgressions.'

"'Every one must answer for himself, as you have often told me.'

"'Yes.'

"'Then I shall decline to answer for Adam. Let him settle his own account.'

"'But you are leaving the subject—the forgiveness of your father. His spirit mourns at your stubbornness.'

"'How much better it would have been had his spirit corrected its blindness many years ago.'

"He would not accede to the woman's prayer on this subject, but he was very gentle in all else. Some two months before his death she was pronounced cured, but she indicated no purpose to LEAVE THE ASYLUM.

In fact, she stayed while he survived and ministered unto him to the last. I witnessed the death scene. Aughton's body was reclinging upon a couch, while his head rested upon a pillow in Mrs. Fogel's lap.

"'Your mother and other friends are here,' said she, in a low voice, 'and your father stands back in the corner like one lacking a welcome. He looks much distressed. Do you not think, dear, that he has suffered enough, and that in this solemn hour he should be gladdened by your forgiveness?'

"No answer.

"'He walked by his lights and did his duty as he understood it. Do not blame him more for lack of enlightenment. Your mother joins in this prayer.'

"'I don't see mother,' whispered the dying man. 'Where is she?'

"'Here at your side.'

"'Ah, now I see her, and father, and Uncle Joe, and—who is that? It's Aunt Kate, and here's father looking sad indeed. Yes father, poor old man, I forg-i-v-e ——'

"Breath was lacking to finish the sentence, but we understood that the man's iron will had succumbed at last, and that there was a reunion in shadow land, which would in some degree compensate for the mortal ills of James Aughton.

"After the funeral I remarked to the Superintendent of the asylum that now he would lose his patient who at her entrance was reported insane through Spiritualism.

"'Say not a word,' he answered. 'She is a prize, perhaps all the more worthy by her Spiritualism. In striving to cure Aughton she improved her own condition and endeared herself to all of us here. Through her instrumentality that man died in his right mind, and it looks like a miracle, that which she accomplished. God bless her.'"

SENSING THE INFINITE.

KNOWLEDGE BY INTUITION OR PSYCHIC SENSE—INFINITY IS THE CONGREGATION OF ALL THINGS FINITE.

"Those who assume to have knowledge of a being self-endowed with Omniscience, Omnipotence and Omnipresence, must of necessity be equal or superior to him before they can have the slightest warrant for making the assumption."—Jeffrey Simmons, in The Progressive Thinker of May 9, 1896.

At times there comes into mind, not only located in my brain, but into my mind apparently expanded to every portion of my being, a stillness, a peace, a confidence, a grandeur, a strength, a knowledge, a consciousness, that seems to be an emanation from the finer, the more spiritual, the less gross and material portions of the Universe. It seems to speak of greatness in self, of greatness in others, of greatness in everything. It seems to tell of soul, of immortality, of individuality, of you, and of me, and of the Universality of things, and of the progression of mind and intellect, and of heart, and of conscience, and of power to concentrate and individualize, and yet to come into harmony and rapport with all and several of the minutiæ of the boundlessness within and without our comprehension. And a moment of "time" and a foot or two of "space" are sufficient to condense within themselves all this, and more than I can express, and thus I sense that there are no such things as "time" and "space," and "sound" and "sight," and that the Ego comprehends, without sensing through the five divisions of the physical sense, that the Universality of Mind is the Congregation of all things finite, and thus we have the Infinite.

And at such moments I feel that there is an infiniteness to intellect and soul and heart (or love) that causes the growth of finite things from within itself, and that the finite soul at times of weakness has withdrawn from itself the strength of Infiniteness to just the proportion of its lack of knowledge and consciousness, and like the cell battery, it recuperates its spiritual strength from the decadence of its physical integrity, giving off the particles of matter, thus liberating the spirit for its work in another direction. Physical regeneration in the one is accomplished just as in the other, by accretions of material, though the human mechanism differs in that the human mind controls them both. Thus when the soul, the mind, becomes conscious in its psychic quality, and not by the process of reasoning, of the Infinitude of which it is a part, then may we be said to have "Knowledge of a being self-endowed with omniscience, omnipotence and omnipresence," though it does not necessarily follow that "we must be" equal or superior to him before we can have the slightest warrant for "making the assumption," because anyone who has felt the power possessed by the psychometrist knows that without being changed in my own character I can sense the character of those above above and below me in the scale of life, though I am not much moved by those more nearly like myself.

When the sensations described in the first words of this writing come to me, I am conscious, to a limited extent, that I am o'ershadowed by Supreme Infinity, with all its attributes, though the sensing of those attributes is by no means the same as the hearing of a mere repetion of the words "omniscience, omnipotence and omnipresence.

Neither is the temporary psychometrizing of Infinite attributes the same as an imparting to a finite soul permanently, of even an infinitesimal portion of the Infinite Attributes, nor would a sensing psychically of the presence of one who believes in the existence of a Supreme Personal Individuality be at all the same as the sensations caused by any of the other impressions. Hence the individualizing of one's self is the absolutely requisite quality in a psychic sensitive. Therefore, also, because I know that I can be impressed by the attributes of Omniscience, Omnipotence and Omnipresence, I know that there is a power that overrules all finite things, and who is possessed of these attributes. Also that I have been in close touch with that power. Also that I cannot describe that power in any such terms of finiteness as "God," "Lord," etc., without needlessly limiting, therefore I call it Infinity, The Eternal Universal Infinite, The Divine, or The Over Ruling Power, or any of the words we have coined for the purpose, that bring some sense of that which is over all and includes all, and yet human language, because devised by finite beings, is inadequate of expressing that which they cannot comprehend, and so we who have grasped a measure of psychical development and sensed things which no language can describe, leave unsaid a great deal, and read between the lines.

And we know, too, that abuse of orthodoxy (not kindly criticism) evidences that there are those who do not see the spiritual in things, but look only at the letter, not realizing that the word "God" means more to some than it does to others. "God" means Infinity to some, while to less developed souls it only means something finite, personal, limited. So when I say I don't want "God" in the Constitution, I mean that thing which is finite, partial and revengeful and which I do not want in me. But I would be most happy if that "God" which is described in the Presbyterian Shorter Catechism as "a Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth," could be in everyone's constitution. If we had these words there, there would be no need of further words in Creed or Constitution.

Therefore we see that there is a way of proving the existence of Infinity, but it is only within the confines of each finite soul, in those who are intuitive, or sensitive; and in those who sense the truth in these sensitives who impart their knowledge to others. I may believe in clairvoyance, though I may not be clairvoyant. So I may believe that a sensitive can sense the power that overrules, and thus I gain knowledge to the extent of my susceptibility to Truth and Reason. We also deduce from the experiences of the psychic sensitives, the fact that the reasoning of the Atheist is like the reasoning of one who says there is no Damascus, because, not having seen it himself, he thinks no one has seen it—it does not exist. He brushes aside all evidence presented by others, and reasoning from within himself he can only produce deductions from the premises of stubborn ignorance. Being satisfied with this condition, he must wait until he can grow—develop.

Therefore, also, we see that those who follow the line of argument laid down by our friend assume that there is no way by which a human being can "find out God" or know there exists an Infinite, except that process known as "reasoning from external nature," have only such warrant as is furnished by their own superficial observation "for making the assumption." They will sometime know that "the lesser can comprehend the greater" by contact, by the psychic or soul sense. Not all have reached that point in their soul development at which this contact will make impressions. Those who have, know. psychic sensitives throughout history have endeavored to depict the Infinite by means of words and symbols, and from these finite, inadequate means have sprung "religious," the unthinking, unknowing, undeveloped rabble not seeing the difference between the letter and the spirit; and the successors of these psychics, not being sensitives, or having deteriorated in their moral nature, have built up a system of deception, not trying to teach the real truth.

It also follows that until man does find The Divine he is groping absolutely in the dark, and any deductions he makes concerning the conceptions by others of the Infinite are necessarily full of weak spots, and he has nowhere to stand though he may climb the ladder called the human, toward the infinite until he can sense it from afar.

Then we discern the fact, here becoming evident, that while some find fault with our friend for believing in the law of clairvoyance, calling it "imagination," he, our friend, has never thought that the psychic sense, by which sensitives discern the character and peculiarities of spirits as well as mortals, might be developed until it could comprehend the attributes of Infinitude itself.

The fact that ancient spirits have come back and declared that they have searched for centuries and can find no such a being as God, only proves one of a number of things, namely, first, they may have had some ulterior motive for deception: Second, they may have searched only a short time, for time, as we compute it is unknown to many spirits: Third, they may not be the spirits represented by the manifestations: fourth, it may be true that "man, by searching, cannot find out God," meaning the Infinite, Over Ruling Power. It proves possibly, many things, but this it does not prove, that there is no ruling intelligence, for there is the power in existence, and psychic sensitives know it, whether these returning know-nothings do or not.

There is such a thing as psychometric power, and thousands have tested the power of man to know the Divine. If a psychic can give a "test" of spirit return, then we can have a "test" of The Divine. But to tell all its attributes, to actually know what the Divine is in its Universality, is not yet given to me, and I only ask, can it ever be fully known, or do not we continually develop, and does not Infinity itself expand in new and ever wonderful ways? I think so.

Psychic sense has told me so, and I believe it to-day. Imagination has no more to do with it than it has with clairvoyance, and if you, my friend, do not believe me, you have a road before you that will reveal it to you, but don't say too many things you may want to take back.

JIM BLUDSO.

Wall, no, I can't tell whar he lives,
Because he don't live, you see;
Leastwise, he's got out of the habit
Of livin' like you and me.
Whar have you been for the last three year
That you haven't heard folks tell
How Jimmy Bludso passed in his checks
The night of the Prairie Belle?

He weren't no saint—them engineers
Is all pretty much alike—
One wife in Natchez-under-the-Hill
And another one here in Pike.
A keerless man in his talk was Jim,
And an awkward hand in a row;
But he never flunked, and he never lied—
I reckon he never knowed how.

And this was all the religion he had—
To treat his engine well;
Never be passed on the river;
To mind the pilot's bell;
And if ever the Prairie Belle took fire,
A thousand times he swore,
He'd hold her nozzle agin the bank
Till the last soul got ashore.

All boats has their day on the Mississip,
And her day come at last;
The Movastar was a better boat,
But the Belle she wouldn't be passed.
And so she came tearing along that night—
The oldest craft on the line—
With a nigger squat on her safety valve
And her furnace crammed, rosin and pine.

The fire burst out as she clared the bar,
And burnt a hole in the night,
And quick as a flash she turned and made
For that willer bank on the right.
There was runnin' and cursin', but Jim yelled out,
Over all the infernal roar:—
"I'll hold her nozzle agin the bank
Till the last galoot's ashore!"

Through the hot, black breath of the burnin' boat
Jim Bludso's voice was heard,
And all had trust in his cussedness
And knowed he would keep his word.
And, sure's you're born, they all got off
Afore the smokestacks fell,
And Bludso's ghost went up alone
In the smoke of the Prairie Belle.

He weren't no saint, but at Jedgment
I'd run my chance with Jim
'Longside of some pious gentlemen
That wouldn't shook hands with him.
He seen his duty, a dead-sure thing,
And went for it, thar and then,
And Christ ain't a-going to be too hard
On a man that died for men.

TO THE SPIRITUALISTS OF ARKANSAS.

You are respectfully—earnestly—requested to enter into correspondence with Dr. I. S. Lee, Chaplain of the State Spiritualists' Association, Little Rock, Ark. As every other State in the west now has, or contemplates having a camp-meeting, why should Arkansas Spiritualists neglect such opportunity of advancing our noble cause and becoming acquainted with each other? Why, when in union there is strength? and commanding the respect of your neighbors? and your own betterment? Send your names, and those of investigators in your community, with any information that will be of interest. Those of adjoining States please answer likewise. ISAAC S. LEE, M. D.

AN OBJECT LESSON.

THE SONG OF THE GRAIN OF SAND—CHAPTER OF EARTH HISTORY.

How tiny is the grain of sand on the ocean's shore, still it may be compared with countless grains constituting our earth, like this tiny earth with the great physical universe; and although seemingly insignificant in its minuteness, it has its destiny, uses and experiences, as well as the most gigantic solar orb in the universe. Its composition may be mica, hornblende, felspar, schist, quartzite and iron, and its relatives of the graniterace scattered all over the world, nevertheless, everything yields us a lesson if rightly applied. Now we as mortals, with the organ of approbativeness fairly developed, love to tell of our experiences, then let us listen to the song the tiny grain of sand chants as it is rolled and beaten by the cruel waves like storm-tossed human crafts on the restless sea of life:

It has taken countless ages, says the tiny grain of sand, since I left my torrid habitation nine leagues beneath my present location. The elements and subterranean convulsions have unsolicited moved me from stratum to stratum, and made me inhabitant of all, and contemporary with what now is your earth-crust. I was born when this earth was in its infancy and in a fusing state. My sole relationship is found in the granite race, with the exception of a few of our descendants who have chosen their lochtion in the sandstone and other strata. My experience has been a restless one compared with the life-span of those mortals who to-day complain of a cruel destiny's decree; still it was in my destiny and this earth would have remained in a choatic mass if our race had not been born. I was born in a fusing state, in a rocking, rolling mass; a periodical rest caused me to become solid, and from thence my life actually began. I was segregated with others from the place of my birth, and as the stratum grew above me, I was raised periodically, and ruthlessly tossed among a red sandstone formation.

I hear that men of science term the stratum of my birth, the Archian Times or Azoic Age; the first name means ancient, and the latter, devoid of life. I was above it, as I mentioned, where sea-weeds were making mineral coal-beds. When in time I was tossed up through the upper red sandstone formation, which through ages had covered me beneath, I beheld the first actual life, in the form of mollusks, corals and crinoids, while sea-weeds were yet the principal fossil plant. Here the stratum again changed to an interblending of limestome, shales and conglomerates. The sandstone formations the men of science have termed the Upper and Lower Silurian. How I rose and sank at different periods can be but of little consequence, till I found myself in a new stratum, which was formed in what is termed the Devonian Age Vegetation was making rapid growth, while in the latter or upper part of this stratum lycopods, conifers and ferns abounded, which made your coal-beds later. The seas which had grown to some dimensions contained ganoids and other kinds of fishes capable of existing in the warm ocean waters. Sharks, gars and placederms also disported in the waters, while swarms of insects covered the earth. This earth-crust then was yet a tiny shell, and igneous rocks were at times forced above, while each eruption caused later strata to sink into its caverns; the porphyry and trachyte so upheaved were destructive to vegetable and animal life, the basalt or trappe did less harm when flowing from the igneous craters.

The trees, ferns and other rank vegetable growth of the period, mentioned before, were in the following period submerged beneath oceans at places, and your lignite, bituminous and anthracite coal were the results—each depended in kind upon what species of vegetation was submerged, and also upon what mineral was found in solution in the waters, and also upon the length of time of such submersion. This period your men of science have termed the Carboniferous Age. The stratum above this is termed the Reptilian Age, or Mesozoic Time; and as the earth-crust was growing thicker and less heated, the saurians appeared, and I saw the dinosaurs, ichthyosaurs, plesiosaurs and pterodactyls in their struggle for existence—where each one was capturing and feeding upon the weaker in turn.

During the latter part of this period the Sierra Nevada, the Humboldt ranges and the Wasatch mountains were made, while in the second division of this period the Atlantic coast and the Appalachian ranges were raised above the waters. I saw that the thinner the earth-crust, the oftener internal upheavals and eruptions appeared, while the thicker it grew, the less frequent they became, but more severe; and in the Genozoic Time following, the upturning of the Rocky Mountains took place, and which made mountains 4,000 feet high in California, and during which some of the Rocky mountains reached the highth of 11,000 feet. As these continental eruptions would cast me up from lower depths at times, and then again bury me thousands of feet beneath the surface whereon mammals, mastodons, monkeys and giant reptiles roamed, I saw it all in its fearful grandeur.

Your men of science have divided the Genozoic Time into the Tertiary and Quaternary Ages, and it is well, for animal life made its most marked strides of progress during these times, while this restless earth raised the Alps, Pyrenees and Apennines in Europe, and the mountain-making pressure on this continet raised the igneous rocks on the Pacific slope and along the coast from Labrador to Cape Cod. In the latter part of the Tertiary Age there were many species that still exist, though more ferocious, savage and wild, among them the modern hog and hippopotamus. There were also flesh-eating animals allied to the dog; and through this period horses were found. Mastodons, elephants, camels and monkeys abounded in the Rocky Mountains prior to the first glacial period which followed, and this brings it into what is termed the Quaternary Age.

The different species of animals made their appearance, while many in their turn were crowded out of existence by still other species and causes, in which climatic changes by the cooling of the earth's crust as it grew thicker, was one of the great agencies. The frigidity at the poles had formed mountains of ice which latter sought lower levels, and the drift period, which has marked the White mountains to a highth of 5,500 feet, and many others, followed, and leveled your alluvial plains above the fortieth parallel.

Though your earth-crust had grown for countless ages, it was yet too crude to sustain the higher animal, Man. The species diversified and grew in number unprecedently during this following period, and the mastodons and marsupials roamed on the plains, when a second glacial period or reindeer epoch became suddenly extreme, which extinguished and imbedded in the drifts many of the species extant.

At this latter period I first saw man in his wild, crude state, compared with the present, contemporary with the cave-bear and mammals; and you may find in the caverns and river deposits the relics of stone arrow-heads, lance-heads and pestles; and also buried human bones; and you may also find ivory, bone, horn and stone cut with figures of existing animals of the Palæolithic Era in human history. Your men of science have justly termed it the Neolithic Era, and in their geological researches they have discovered no human remains which can be referred to a higher antiquity than the Quaternary Age. You will find also that the human remains in the Stone Age are those of uncivilized man, but nothing to indicate that they were of a race inferior to the lowest of existing races among you, or which shows any connecting link between man and the lower animals, except in tendency, but not in form.

The world that commenced to form twenty-seven miles beneath us, has shown its grand possibilities. Intellectual progress as well as rockmaking is still going on; beauty in color and form is encouraged and cultivated; Nature's grand laws are daily better understood and applied; wild animals and brutal conduct in man is hourly crowded out of existence; and, while I again sing on the turbulent sea-shore among my copeers of the Archæan Epoch, may universal progress continue in all things till knowledge, harmony and peace exist in the minds of all. THEY ARE NOT VALUABLE.

Camp-Meetings, as Set Forth by a Californian, Are of Questionable Value, and Accomplish but Little for the Cause.

As one who has made a study of Spiritualists' camp-meetings and their results, I deem it a duty to give my observations thereon. Everyone who has attended a Spiritualists' camp knows that the expense entailed is a considerable sum, not to mention the value of time lost from business, transportation, etc.

Now, if those having camp-meetings in charge would rent a large hall or even pitch a tent on a vacant block in some large city near the site of the proposed camp, the same mediums and speakers could be employed, and meetings held the same as if they were "forty miles from Nowhere." The result would be that local daily papers would co-operate in booming the enterprise, and the city would be captured. This has been demonstrated in San Francisco, and the result was more than satisfactory, considering the efforts put forth. Busy people could then follow their daily avocations and at night attend the "Spiritualists' revivals," besides those coming from a distance could obtain much better accommodations at the hotels, and at a far less rate than camp expenses would necessarily be.

The savings thus annually made by individuals would build several good-sized Spiritualist temples, and the converts made would be almost one hundred to one by the camp method.

Again, the camper, who is usually out for recreation, is in no frame of mind to assimilate spiritual food or philosophy of a deep nature!

Many years ago the Methodists discovered the uselessness of camp-meetings and abandoned them for local "revivals," which were found to be far more successful in winning converts.

If Spiritualists cannot organize, build temples, employ speakers by the year, keep open doors to the public without an admission fee, have free libraries and reading-rooms, and otherwise show the same sincerity as other religious bodies, and last but not least, quit their suicidal camp-meeting policy, they may as well "throw up the sponge," and everyone "paddle his own canoe."

There are thousands of wealthy and influential Spiritualists who would "come out of the woods" and help us if the above lines of action were attempted, but until then they prefer to stand aloof.

Now is our opportunity. A universal religion is upon us which will be based upon spiritual philosophy and psychic phenomena. Every vibration from the soul-world proclaims it; every sign of the times points to it. Will Spiritualism be that religion?

Unless Spiritualists awake from their dreamless lethargy they will soon be aroused to behold the fabric of their hopes going down in the night of oblivion amidst the flames of progression, and from its ashes will arise the religion of the future with another label—it may be an existing system revised.

A SOUTHERN WELCOME.

At the request of our beloved friend, Dr. R. Greer, of Chicago, who made us here two welcome visits during the past year, I write for the information of those among your readers who would like to know more of this land of sunshine, of health, of fruits and of flowers. Having resided here twenty years or more, I know that the climate here is all that mortal man can desire. It is mild and favorable under all conditions, neither too cold in winter, nor too hot in summer. I can name several people who have traveled to far-famed Italy, where the sky and moonlights are so grand, and they all exclaim with one consent that they prefer this climate to any other; they say that in the moonlights here there is something so dreamy, something so fascinating, which reaches beyond the physical, permeating the soul.

But let me tell of that which, perhaps, will interest more the small farmer, or persons of moderate means, who would like to secure here a permanent home. In addition to a lovely climate, the soil is fertile and productive, the surface being of sandy loam with clay subsoil. No soil can produce a richer variety of cereals, fruits and vegetables than can the soil of this Southern region, and no region of country is better adapted to stock-raising because of the abundant growth of pasture.

Land here is cheap, rain is plenty, lumber and fruit low in price, and water excellent. There are thousands of acres of land along the coast here for sale at low prices, and on easy terms. With these advantages of soil and climate, together with the products of the sea—oysters and fish—right at their door, none need go hungry for a single day. The mild climate admits of hunting, fishing, sailing, driving, bicycle riding, boating, bathing, almost all the year round. Take it all in all the South has more to offer to persons of small means than any other section of these United States. On the coast here there are a multitude of handsome vacant lots now waiting for purchasers, and those who would have a "sweet, sweet home" in a cottage by the sea, now would be their golden opportunity while such lots can be had so cheap.

Dr. R. Greer when down here last summer bought him a lovely building lot, immediately adjoining the palatial residence of the late Jeff Davis, and the Doctor is preparing to build upon it.

I will add that the people here are of a most kindly social nature, always ready to extend the hand of welcome and of friendship to Northerners, and always disposed to do unto others as they would have others do unto them.

A CONGRESS.

Composed of Many Religions

AIMS AND OBJECTS OF CONFERENCE TO BE HELD AT DELHI, INDIA.

Salem, Oregon, March 10, 1897.—To the Editor:—It may be of interest to many of the readers of The Progressive Thinker to be kept informed in regard to the "Second Congress of Religions." I am just in receipt of a letter of which the following is a copy, to-wit:

"Delhi, India, Jan. 1, 1897.—Dear Sir: I beg to ask the favor of your kindly allowing me to enter your name in the list of members of the Universal Conference of Religions, which is to be held at Delhi, D. V. 1898. That such a gathering will do a lasting good and put a stop to unnecessary controversies is certain. In the name of humanity and justice I appeal to your better feelings, and hope that the favor asked for will not be refused. Any alteration and suggestion made by you in our views will be most thankfully received. Extracts of all correspondence, the opinions of several papers, and the prospectus relative to the aims and objects of the conference are enclosed herewith for your kind perusal. An early reply will highly oblige your most obedient servant,

S. M. NUSRAT ALI, Secretary.
"To Dr. S. C. Adams, Salem, Or."

A newspaper of 12 pages published in Delhi by S. M. Nusrat Ali accompanied the letter, filled with correspondence from Moslem, Buddhistic, Christian and other people, of which highly interesting matter space will only permit a brief extract.

The Moslem Chronicle of February, 1896, says:

"Maulvi Nusrat Ali, of Delhi, has arranged for a Universal Congress of Religions in the ancient capital of India, Delhi. The aims and objects are: First, to bring together the eminent and leading representatives of all religions of the world with a view to enable them to expound the merits of their respective creeds; second, to ascertain what practical, social and moral effects each religion has produced upon the community professing it; third, to set forth how far the doctrines of each religion are in conformity with reason, science and the laws of nature; fourth, to trace the origin of each religion and to scrutinize the system followed in the preservation of its traditions. Maulvi Nusrat Ali is one of the enlightened men of the N. W. P., and of good sound learning. His proposal is a laudable one, but it requires concentration of energy of leading men of thought and of sufficient funds to meet expenses."

The liberal, gracious and catholic spirit exhibited by Moslem and other Oriental writers, sounds strange and refreshing to those who are only familiar with the sectarianism and acrimony of our own "Christian lands."

As a representative and contributing member of the congress from Oregon, I hereby submit my suggestions and reply, as follows, to-wit:

"Salem, Or., U. S. A., Feb. 16, 1897.—S. M. Nusrat Ali, Delhi, India.—Respected and Dear Sir: Your kind request for the enrollment of my name in the list of the honorable members of the Universal Congress of Religions, to be held at Delhi, India, in 1898, has just been received. The distinguished honor thus extended is most highly appreciated, and is most cordially accepted with considerations of high esteem for its noble originator, as well as for the aims and objects of the conference.

"Age, and the unconquerable bar of poverty will doubtless prevent my attendance, and my consequent acquaintance and association with the illustrious apostles of a progressive and rational religion then and there assembled. But I beg to assure you that my sincere sympathy and interest in their divine and laudable endeavor will second and indorse their every act which tends to the grand realization of the avowed aims and objects of the high conference. For every true prophet of God has become most profoundly impressed with the conviction that the day has fully come when any religion worthy of universal acceptance must be in conformity with reason, science and the laws of nature. For, as God is the author of nature, these terms are substantially synonymous and interchangeable; so that any religion that does not conform to the laws of nature cannot be in harmony with the laws of God.

"Having been a diligent searcher after truth and a preacher of righteousness for many years, the divine light has at last most clearly impressed upon my mind the dominant truth, that the best and noblest results of the divinest 'religion' possible for man is the one that will produce the abiding conviction of the universal brotherhood of man, and the daily practice of the divine principle of righteousness in every relation of life. For this and this only can abrogate the present state of confusion and strife and variance, and inaugurate the reign of brotherhood, of righteousness and peace upon the earth. In all candor I would humbly suggest that no more comprehensive, catholic and unobjectionable creed could be adopted for the intelligent world than the divine and apostolic declaration that "The world is my country and to do good is my religion." This is a most faithful saying and worthy of universal acceptation. It is the magic key to open the doors of the kingdom of heaven on earth, and embraces a perfect religion that is in harmony with reason, science and the laws of nature. When fully analyzed it is found to embrace every principle of a most perfect and divine religion, and a perfect rule of faith and practice.

"It seems very evident, and almost axiomatic to me, that the soul of the universe pulsates unintermittingly, so that its revelations of truth are uninterrupted and continuous to all those who have ears to hear and hearts to understand and receive its truths. Its divine words are not only unremittent, but they keep pace with the progress and enlightenment of its children; so that it is the height of absurdity to revert to a darker and more barbarous age for all the light and truth we need to-day either in science or in religion. We should learn to regard our Eternal Father as a living spirit which is in ceaseless activity and in constant fellowship with his offspring, and not as one who only spoke in olden times, but has ever since relapsed into a state of innocuous desuetude. I shall feel highly honored to receive any other information or documents you may be pleased to send me.

"Hoping for most excellent results from the labors of the high conference, and with considerations of profound regard, please permit me to remain your friend and brother, S. C. ADAMS."

THOUGHT PHOTOGRAPHY

MENTAL PICTURES TRANSFERRED TO SENSITIVE PLATES BY WILL POWER.

To the Editor:—Doubtless your thousands of readers read the able article in your issue of December 5th, under the above heading, with bated breath and the intense interest which the subject deserves.

To show that the idea is of spiritual origin, I would like to quote from one of my automatic and inspirational works entitled "Mary Anne Carew, Wife, Mother, Spirit, Angel," written through me about ten years ago, and published by James Burns, in London, and simultaneously as a serial in the Banner of Light, in 1893.

The quotation alluded to begins on page 199, during a visit of Mary Carew to an infant school within the Heavenly sphere. "'Now we will have some pictures,' she continued, and a little girl seated herself in front of an easel. It was one on which there was no picture; but, instead of a canvas being stretched on a frame, there was a shining surface of palest blue, oval in form.

"The little girl sat for a short time with rapt, thoughtful face and motionless, gazing intently at the oval frame, or rather, its shining surface. This surprised me, for I had expected her to use brushes and palette. Presently she arose with a smile, and turned the easel so that we could all see the picture which she had transferred to the oval plate, and it was a very beautiful picture indeed. As Annie had drawn pictures for me in the same way, I understood how it was done, or comprehended it in part.

"'We draw, or transfer, all our pictures here, upon a sensitive plate, by the use of magnetism and electricity,' explained Ursula. 'Our clock is run in the same way. That plate is merely a thin plate of silver. First, it is magnetized, and we keep a number of them on hand, which have previously been magnetized, ready for use, as the younger children do not as yet understand how to magnetize a silver plate. This process is accomplished by those more advanced than we are—by angels who understand scientific processes better than we do—and we transfer a picture to the prepared plates by fixing the mind intently on the plate, at the same time forming the picture with great distinctness within our minds; the picture is thus transferred to the magnetic plate by the electric rays of light shooting from our minds directly upon the plate, and the picture is fixed there by the combination of magnetism and electricity; or, rather, when the rays of electric light strike the magnetic plate, the magnetism is changed into the various shades and colors requisite for the picture.

"'You know, dear lady, that when the electric light of the sun strikes an opaque cloud at a certain angle, a rainbow appears visible to the people of earth, and all the colors with which one desires to paint a picture, reside within the electric rays which are disclosed by a rainbow. Now that magnetized sensitive plate is opaque, the same as the cloud is; and when that little girl casts the electric rays from her mind, or spirit, at a certain angle on that plate, it forms the picture that she has drawn in her mind, precisely as a rainbow is formed in the clouds of earth, or, the principle is the same.'

"All the little girls, in turn, now painted a picture. It took each one but a few seconds, and every girl formed a picture according to her age and ability; at last, it was Katy's turn. My baby was too young for this, but Katy was just commencing.

"'Now,' said Ursula, 'can Katy make a little picture?'

"'Dess me tan,' said Katy, pursing up her sweet lips. 'Now you all keep still while me finks.'

"And Katy fixed her dewy eyes on the prepared plate. Presently she clapped her little hands in glee. Ursula turned the easel toward us, and there, in bold relief stood the white heifer, with the wreath of dandelions around her neck.

"'Well done, Katy!' said Ursula. 'You shall paint another one as a reward.'

"She placed another plate on the easel; Katy fixed her eyes on it intently with a sort of scared expression, and soon turned away. Ursula moved the easel toward us, and there, with scowling, angry features, was Mrs. Evans, her hand upraised just in the act of throwing the goblet at Ponto's head, while the negro was showing all his ivories.

"'All acts are pictures which remain within the mind of the beholder forever,' said Ursula, with a sigh. 'Would that this child's mother had not left such a picture within her little daughter's soul, never to be erased while the ages roll onward. All the world is a picture, painted by the electric rays from the sun, as they strike sensitive, opaque substance; for when there is no light there is no picture; nothing is visible. So, think it not strange that we here paint our pictures from the electricity, which resides within us, upon magnetized plates.'"

Bubbles or Medals.

"Best sarsaparillas." When you think of it how contradictory that term is. For there can be only one best in anything—one best sarsaparilla, as there is one highest mountain, one longest river, one deepest ocean. And that best sarsaparilla is ——?.... There's the rub! You can measure mountain height and ocean depth, but how test sarsaparilla? You could if you were chemists. But then do you need to test it? The World's Fair Committee tested it,—and thoroughly. They went behind the label on the bottle. What did this sarsaparilla test result in? Every make of sarsaparilla shut out of the Fair except Ayer's. So it was that Ayer's was the only sarsaparilla admitted to the World's Fair. The committee found it the best. They had no room for anything that was not the best. And as the best, Ayer's Sarsaparilla received the medal and awards due its merits. Remember the word "best" is a bubble any breath can blow; but there are pins to prick such bubbles. Those others are blowing more "best sarsaparilla" bubbles since the World's Fair pricked the old ones. True, but Ayer's Sarsaparilla has the medal. The pin that scratches the medal proves it gold. The pin that pricks the bubble proves it wind. We point to medals, not bubbles, when we say: The best sarsaparilla is Ayer's.

Woman, Church and State.

A Historical Account of the Status of Woman Through the Christian Ages, with Reminiscences of the Matriarchate.

BY MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE.

THE AMOUNT OF VALUABLE INformation succinctly and clearly stated in this volume of 554 pages is amazing. The title, as above given, fails to convey an idea of the fulness and completeness with which the subjects are treated. The Matriarchate, or Motherrule, is the theme of the first chapter, in which much lore, quaint, queer and curious, is brought to view in elucidation of the subject. This is followed by chapters on Celibacy, Canon Law, Marguette, Witchcraft, Wives, Polygamy, Woman and Work, The Church of To-day, Past, Present, Future; and there is not a chapter in the book that is not handled in a masterly manner, and that for quantity and quality of information, is not worth the full price of the volume. It is packed with knowledge well-arranged, and intensely interesting from beginning to end. No one can possibly regret buying it; it is a valuable addition to the library of any free and truth-loving mind.

IMMORTALITY,

This admirable work contains what a hundred spirits, good and evil, say of their dwelling-places. Give us details—details and accurate delineations of life in the Spirit-world!—is the constant appeal of thoughtful minds. Death is approaching. Whither—oh, whither! Shall I know my friends beyond the tomb? Will they know me? What is their present condition, and what their occupations? In this volume the spirits, differing as they may, are allowed to speak for themselves. No man is better qualified than Dr. Peebles to place a work of this kind before the people. He treats of the Mysteries of Life; Doubts and Hopes; The Bridging of the River; Foregleams of the Future; Testimony of Saints; The Growth and Perfection of the Spiritual Body; Is it the Soul or Body that Sins?; Clothing in the Spirit-world; Our Little Ones in Heaven; The Personal Experiences of Aaron Knight; The Red Man's Testimony; Evil Spirits; Testimony of Physicians in Spirit-Life; The Homes of Apostles and Divines; The Friends and Shakers in Spirit-Life; Spirit Homes of Bruno and Others; Many Voices from the Spirit-Land. VULGAR EXPLETIVES.

Can there be any apology for the vulgar habit of profanity, so very common among many thoughtless persons? It betokens a low plane of thought, the user frequently interlarding every sentence with an expletive, annoying to refined ears, and degrading to those who resort to such foolish methods to make their expressions emphatic. In the heat of anger, the occasion a grave one when reason is almost dethroned, the accidental vulgarism may be looked upon with more leniency; but these outbursts will seldom or never occur to one whose language at other times is always correct. There is one case on record where strong language, "the word with the bark on," as an old acquaintance used to call it, seemed justifiable. During the Revolution the patriot army under Gen. Lee was making a disorderly retreat at Monmouth, through the inefficiency, or lack of loyalty, as some historians allege. General Washington chanced to meet the flying forces led by Lee, to whom in angered tones:

"What is the meaning of this, sir?"

Lee hesitated a reply, when, as reported by Gen. Lafayette—see Curtis' Washington, vol. 1, chap. 5—the aspect of Washington became terrible, and he again demanded:

"I desire to know the meaning of this disorder and confusion!"

Lee made an angry reply, when Washington called him a "damned poltroon."

Should any of our readers chance to be like situated as was Washington, he will please bear in mind we have no reference to him, but the time is probably distant when the expletive will be needed.

Is it not a fact that the clergy, by priority of use, are entitled to the exclusive employment of those vulgarisms?

THE DIFFERENCE.

When the art of printing was first discovered the monks and priests ascribed the invention to the Devil, and labored to suppress the sale of books made by the new process. The art of writing was credited to God. What passes as the early production of those ancient times is received as the word of God. Both systems were doubtless stepping-stones to higher civilizations; but the Devil's invention has taken the lead, and the world is filled with learning in consequence. The difference: The books alleged to have come from the hand of God remain substantially the same forever, though abounding in errors which would drive any other into obscurity. The Devil commenced in 1440, with making letters cut on bark, and pressed on paper by hand, using common writing ink. His system has improved day by day, without any period of rest, down to the present. Under its beneficent influence the world has advanced from almost savageism to its present enlightenment, the devotees of the older system, having been ever active in trying to place obstacles in the way of progress. No one can guess the heights in knowledge the world would have attained had the Devil's discovery met with no obstruction.

PRESIDENT BARRETT.

H. D. Barrett, president of the National Association of Spiritualists, has been appointed editor in-chief of the Banner of Light. The Banner is an old favorite, and has done a vast amount of good for the cause of Spiritualism. It has made a deeper impress, on account of its age, on the present generation, than all other Spiritualist papers combined, and we congratulate its proprietor, Mr. Rich, in securing the services of Mr. Barrett—one so thoroughly well equipped for the position. In reference to this matter Lyman C. Howe writes: "I was happily surprised to learn that Professor H. D. Barrett is from this time to be editor in-chief of the Banner of Light. He will put new fire into the time honored life of that excellent representative advocate of Spiritualism and its outlying fields of reform. His personality will carry it with new interest into thousands of homes where he is personally known as one of the most enthusiastic workers for the cause."

AIDING GOD.

We are told the Ten Commandments came from the hand of God, and were enacted for all time. That fellow Walter, in the Kansas Legislature, seems to suppose them obsolete, with insufficient penalties, so he proposes to lend God a helping hand by their re-enactment, with severer penalties. The modern Solon has more confidence in the efficacy of human legislation than he has in a law of God.

SUICIDE IN EUROPE.

From recent statistics it appears 25,000 people commit suicide in Europe each year. In Paris alone the number last year was 8,226—Medical Herald.

It is astonishing what influence Col. Ingersoll has on the Eastern continent. And stranger than all, this suicide business was just as common before his unwise lecture as since.

BRAVE WORDS FROM THE PULPIT.

Rev. Dr. Abbott, of Plymouth church, has not been frightened from his course because ignorance on the one hand and bigotry on the other, assailed him. It is questionable if the charge of radicalism would change his front. His position, and that of thousands of the most learned of the clergy, is identical with that of The Progressive Thinker, that the Bible, notwithstanding it has a Latin name in place of the homely English word, Book, and though the contents are also known by the Latin name of Scriptures, instead of plain Writings, yet book and contents should be subject to the same criticisms as any other book or writings. It takes one step farther than some of its readers: It has no inclination to brand the book as holy because it furnishes evidence that the loved dead held communion with mortals in ages past. It believes such revelations are in harmony with natural law; have always been and always will be; that the ancients mistook the voice of spirits for the voice of God, and that people of to-day are misled because of the ignorance of the past.

Rev. Abbott's course of lectures were entitled "The Scientific Conception of Revelation." Space in these columns can only be given to an extract, which might be profitably extended to a page. He said:

"The scientist approaches the Bible from what may be called a scientific, or a literary point of view. He assumes no theory of inspiration. When he is asked if it contains no error, he answers that he will look and see,

"The scientist, even if he does not believe the book is inspired, still believes the book must be read as other literature is read. Inspired philology is no different from uninspired philology. The scientist must assume that the same laws of grammar apply to inspired literature as to uninspired literature.

"If you take up a history and it refers to Abraham Lincoln, you are perfectly sure it was not written in the time of George Washington. Now, if you take up the book of Isaiah and read in it about Cyrus the Great, you are satisfied the book was not written by Isaiah, one hundred years before Cyrus the Great was born. Thus the scientific student of the Bible puts the traditions aside as of little value.

"We take this book, then, and open it. We find first of all, it is not a book, but a library of sixty-six books, which it took 1,400 years to bring together. We find the book is a growth, and that it grew out of the church. The church was not founded on the Bible. The Bible was founded on the church. There is no question about that. One thousand years elapsed between the founding of the church and the completion of the Old Testament, and two centuries elapsed between the founding of the Christian church and the completion of the New Testament.

"The student looks at the Bible, and finds there fiction, poetry, dramatic writings, etc. The Puritan could not believe there was fiction, or poetry, or drama in the Bible, because he believed such things were wicked; but we do not believe such things are wicked. Why, therefore, should we accept the conclusion of the Puritan, while we reject his reasons for that conclusion?"

The Doctor was interrupted at this point by a clergyman in the audience, who inquired: "What do you think of the book of Genesis?" to which, replied Doctor Abbott:

"Nothing is more certain than that the story of creation and of the flood is to be found on the Assyrian tablets that existed for ages before the time of Moses. What I believe is, the book of Genesis is a book of prehistoric legends, that were rewritten at the time of Moses or thereabouts. The author of the book of Genesis does not say where he got his information, and no other writer in the Bible gives any information on that point. I see no reason in the Bible for believing that the story of the creation was revealed to the author of Genesis by God."

TO DELVE INTO MAN'S HISTORY.

A late news dispatch from New York says: Morris K. Jessup, president of the American Museum of Natural History, will equip and send out the largest expedition in the line of anthropology and ethnology ever supported solely by an individual.

America, Asia and Africa are to be visited, and the information gleaned of man in his earliest stages, together with specimens collected, will be turned over to the Museum of Natural History. The expenses of the expedition, which it is estimated will be about $60,000, will be defrayed by Mr. Jessup himself.

Professor F. W. Putnam, who was in charge of the anthropological division of the World's Fair, will head the expedition, assisted by Dr. Ross. They will have a competent corps of assistants, and expect to occupy six or seven years in their researches.

WANT THE OFFICES.

The preachers seem to suppose the present national administration is a special child of theirs, so they wish to share in the principal offices. Rev. Martin, of this city, has an ambition to succeed Fitz Hugh Lee, as consul-general to Cuba; Rev. Dr. Holmes, of Terre Haute, Ind., would like to be minister to Denmark; Rev. Isaac S. Hopkins, of Atlanta, Ga., is sure he would distinguish himself as minister to Greece. These are not all, but it shows the trend of things. Not an applicant thus far, so far as we have noticed, to be a priestly ambassador to the cannibal islands, where they would meet with special welcome.

A BRAVE THINKER GONE.

We grieve to learn that John Steve, for near fifty years a resident of Durand, Ill., closed his earth-life on the 16th ult., in the 77th year of his age. Mr. Steve was an advanced thinker, for a time a patron of The Progressive Thinker, and always a great admirer of its independent character. He was a prolific writer on social, economical and religious subjects, and expected some day to publish a book in support of his advanced views, but consumption laid its heavy hand on him before his task of many years was completed. Old friend, a long and peaceful sleep, with no dreams of infuriated demons to disturb your repose.

SILENCING DEBATE.

A Cleveland physician recently filled his daughter-in-law's mouth with liquid plaster, which soon hardened so she could not speak. Did the gentleman borrow the idea of closing a discussion in that way from the Inquisitors, who poured melted lead down the throats of heretics? The talkative daughter-in-law has brought suit against the modern experimenter, claiming $5,000 for the improper use of her mouth as a matrix for making plaster casts. Cheap enough; she ought to have claimed double the amount.

GOING TO ROME.

Prof. Briggs, the Presbyterian heretic, has recently sailed for Europe. He was interviewed by a press correspondent on the eve of his departure, and is reported among other things to have said:

"I expect to spend the latter part of my vacation in Rome, in study of the Roman Catholic controversy, with special reference to the question of the union of the churches. I have great admiration for the present Pope, Leo XIII. I think he has the cause of church unity at heart, and that the words he has lately issued to the various Protestant and Oriental bodies, for unity, have been able and statesmanlike. I am of the opinion that he has gone as far as anyone can reasonably expect him to go until some cordial response to his proposals has been given. . . . I have learned to look upon some of the Roman Catholic positions more favorably than I used to. . . . I think there are possibilities in the future of a reunion of the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches."

We quote the above from the Literary Digest of March 13. From a less reliable journal we should expect the facts were garbled; but finding them as we do there is no reason to distrust the genuineness of the report.

As a whilom ardent admirer of Prof. Briggs, because of his earnest and independent utterances, we own to deep mortification to find him occupying his present posture.

It would be a real pleasure to know what portions of the Roman Catholic teaching Prof. Briggs has learned to look upon favorably. Is it because it has a supreme head, an infallible Pope, who voices the will of God to mortals, and who directed the destinies of nations so long as those nations would submit to his authority? Is it because the Pope professes to hold the keys of heaven and of hell, and divides his authority of binding on earth and loosing in heaven with his priesthood? Is it because of its celibate clergy, its harem convents, and its infernal confessional? Does he take a more lenient view of the past history of Catholicism because of its Inquisitorial dungeons, its racks and chains and tortures; its stakes and fire-brands? Does he think a revival of all these will advance civilization; enlarge knowledge; broaden the area of human freedom; increase the general happiness; and make the world better for men, women and children to live in?

"Kissing the foot or toe has been required by the Popes as a sign of respect from the secular power since the eighth century," says the Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, article "Kiss." If the learned Professor shall indulge in this luxury, will he return to America filled with pomp and pride, and insist he is nearer heaven than common mortals?

The carrion-bird will flop his sooty wings and rejoice when Prof. Briggs shall return home with still greater admiration for the reigning Pope, and his seductive methods of enlisting recalcitrants in his service; but is there not danger the bird of freedom will take his departure in disgust soon after, and leave us forever?

UNDER THE SOUTHERN CROSS.

Of all the many spiritual journals, the Harbinger of Light, published at Melbourne, Australia, in dignity of style, and instructive contents is with the foremost. Its editor and publisher, H. W. Terry, has almost a quarter of a century maintained its superiority, and by his own self-sacrifice given the Spiritualists in that furtherest country a paper that the very center of civilization might well be proud of. He has never for a moment been turned to any of the side issues, but kept Spiritualism as the one science and philosophy of life constantly in view.

Mr. Terry is a true Spiritualist by organization, a psychic of extraordinary power, and as a physician has no superior. To his own learning he is able to bring the most perfect intelligence from the spirit-side, and his success in curing the most difficult cases has been little short of miraculous.

In the February number, Mr. Terry has an able editorial on reincarnation. He allowed the use of his columns for discussion of that subject, and concludes that such discussion if allowed to go on would be endless, as well as unprofitable. He says that the very antique idea of reincarnation was revived by Allan Kardec, and taught by him, and has been received by a great many European Spiritualists. He reviews the evidences in its favor, and finds none that will bear questioning.

The other school led by Swedenborg, Davis, Tuttle, Judge Edmunds, Mrs. King, Stainton Moses, and all who stand on the firm ground of science, repudiate reincarnation as a dream of the childhood of the race, revived by those who prefer speculation to demonstration.

Wisely Mr. Terry remarks that this is not a "burning question," which many would have us believe, and is rather calculated to divert attention of investigators from much more pressing problems of how best the great work of the spiritualization of man shall be carried forward. X.

A BEAUTIFUL CLAIRVOYANT VISION.

While mingling with a parlor group of friends, seeking spiritual culture, I beheld clairvoyantly in a grassy park, a magnificent white marble edifice, pure and flawless, circular in form, with many spires, and a grand arched entrance denoting fine artistic skill and ornamentation. Looking intently in wondrous admiration upon the circular building, I perceived a massive side structure, also of white marble (but having a veined or clouded aspect), and of long and notably high dimensions, and part of the main edifice, a corridor apparently leading out to the park.

As I stood silently viewing the grand spectacle, a spirit anear me, said with emphasis: "That is a monument to Truth."

How beautiful, then, to give spirit expression to Truth's excellence, and I thought in coming centuries the "cardinal virtues," now, revered mentally and spiritually, may each also be thus monumentized. We admire and revere the higher characteristics of persons of our time, expressing it in sublime sentiment, and in grand monuments reared to their memory, thus bearing testimony to exalted virtue and principle.

The marble corridor of veined or clouded appearance, I thought might denote an aspect of Truth, while the grand, perfect circular embodied the higher expression of Truth—and, the many spires, forms of Truth, aspiring to light. MAY TRIMBLE.

WHAT WE WANT TO DO.

We desire to illuminate the minds of every Spiritualist. We will therefore send The Progressive Thinker to new subscribers for three months for fifteen cents, and hope by so doing to reach 1,000,000 of Spiritualists. For full particulars in reference to this remarkable offer read the communication headed "Fifteen Cents," on our fifth page.

A GRAND MEDIUM.

IT IS MANIFESTED THROUGH THE SENSE OF TOUCH, MAKING HIM A MARVELOUS INSTRUMENT IN THE HANDS OF THE ANGEL WORLD.

As set forth by the Mail and Express of New York, the death of Dr. Charles Sweet, which occurred recently in his native town of Lebanon, Conn., removes another member of the famous family of bonesetters. They were spoken of as the natural bonesetters, and it is said they never opened a book on the subject of anatomy. The death of Mr. Sweet probably leaves only two persons in the country who make a practice of setting bones by instinct. One is "Bonesetter" Reese, of Youngstown, Ohio. He is now a student in a Cleveland (Ohio) medical college. A recent law enacted in Ohio forbids the practice of medicine or surgery without a certificate of graduation and a State license, and Reese will have to take a regular collegiate course before he can resume his mysterious healing powers.

"Bonesetter" Reese has never studied anatomy in his life, his phenomenal cures, so to speak, all being accomplished by the "laying on of hands." "Bonesetter" does not claim that his cures are performed with the assistance of divine power. His fame extends over nearly every State in the Union, and his departure for Cleveland recently caused a crush at his home in Youngstown, Ohio. Some of his patients came in cabs, and others hobbled along on crutches, but all received the same greeting and all apparently went away cured. There were people present from Akron, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Washington, New Castle and other adjoining towns. All expressed sincere faith in the powers of their untutored physician.

WONDERFUL CURES.

One old man came from Austintown. He had been compelled to use crutches since last spring, owing to an injury to his ankle. He left the house without his crutches and seemed as happy as a boy out of school. An old woman from New Castle came to the house with her arm in a sling. It had been fractured and afterward set by a regular practicing surgeon. The pain afterward became almost unbearable. "Poor job," said Reese, after he examined the fractured arm. "It must be reset." Grasping the wrist firmly in his right hand he gave the arm a peculiar twist. There was a sharp snap, a crunching of bones and the operation was over.

Another of "Bonesetter's" remarkable cures was that of a Sewickley boy who had been unable to walk for two years. Physicians had been treating him for necrosis of the bone. Reese's marvelous sense of touch enabled him to discover the cause of the boy's affliction, and with a few twists and jerks the ligaments and joints were placed in their proper position and the boy has not been troubled since. Physicians cannot account for "Bonesetter's" skill. They deride him unmercifully, but are compelled to admit that he has made some marvelous cures. He has practiced his peculiar profession for the last twenty years and has many thousands of cures to his credit. There has never been a fracture of any kind that was beyond his skill.

BEGAN WITH CATTLE.

He became known for his wonderful gift of anatomy when a mere boy. He lived on a farm on the outskirts of Youngstown, Ohio, with his parents. He proved that it wasn't necessary to kill a cow, a dog or a pig because it had broken its leg. The broken limbs of the stock around the farm afforded ample portunities for young Reese to exercise his skill. As a veterinary surgeon he soon commanded attention that extended beyond the limits of his own county. Reese was called upon to doctor the injured stock of the farms for miles around. When a boy he liked nothing better than to dissect some animal, and in his own crude way learned anatomy. He dislocated bones for the mere pleasure of putting them together again. There was not an injured animal or bird within reach that Reese didn't experiment on.

Of course, it was but natural that he turned his attention to the setting of human bones, and it was soon discovered that his skill was not merely limited to the setting of animal bones. His reputation grew so amazingly that he abandoned the farm to take up his peculiar profession in more extensive fields.

Reese is now permanently located in Youngstown, Ohio, but has traveled all over the country. In some districts the people looked on him with awe and superstition. "Bonesetter" is married, and has a large family, but, strange to say, not one of his children inherits his wonderful instinct. He does not require the assistance of the "X" rays in locating foreign objects in the flesh. His delicate sense of touch is all that is necessary. On one occasion a bullet had been imbedded in a boy's leg for several years. Attempts to locate it had been of no avail. Running his finger tips lightly over the boy's arm, Reese declared that he had located the ball. The attending physician who accompanied the boy doubted Reese's assertion, and was at first reluctant to commence the operation.

"I know the ball is there," said Reese, "Cut into the flesh as I have described and you will find it." The doctor was finally persuaded to perform the operation, and to his amazement found the bullet in the exact place Reese said it would be found.

ALL SENSE OF TOUCH.

"I am not a Schlätter," he will reply when asked to explain how he acquired his mysterious gift. "I do not profess to be a divine healer. The only explanation I can give is that my sense of touch is more delicate than that of the average human being." Reese receives dozens of letters every day containing money from people who ask to be cured by the "laying on of hands." He also receives handkerchiefs to be blessed and returned, but he is not in the divine healing business, and returns them with his regrets, but not his blessings. In spite of his miraculous cures he is a poor man. He never makes any charges for his services except to those who are able to pay.

Mr. Reese is undoubtedly a most excellent medium, his delicate sense of touch being influenced by the angel world.

HAWAII ISLANDS.

The Library of Universal Knowledge says the population of the Sandwich Islands, when the missionaries landed there in 1820, was estimated at 130,000 to 150,000. In 1872 the official census gave 56,899. A census of the Islands just taken makes the native population, 31,019; Japanese, 24,407; Chinese, 21,616; Portugese, 15,191; British, Germans, French and Americans, 10,687. The American population alone, who usurped the government, vary but slightly from 3,000.

"Mahomet, His Birth, Character and Doctrine." By Edward Gibbons. This is No. 6 of the Library of Liberal Classics. It is conceded to be historically correct, and so exact and perfect in every detail as to be practically beyond the reach of adverse criticism. Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

THOUGHT FLASHES.

SENT FORTH BY THE PACIFIC COAST GREAT OCTOGENARIAN.

THE COMING CRISIS.

WHERE SHOULD SPIRITUALISM LEAD US?—AND WHAT ARE THE OLD CHURCHES WORTH?—BY PROF. J. R. BUCHANAN.

Spiritualism opens wide the gates to the Summer-land where our friends, our best beloved and our forefathers dwell—the gates that have been shut, locked and guarded so long by the imperial ecclesiastical despotism born at Rome, after spiritual Christianity had been crushed in blood.

Mankind have turned away from that horrible history, and few to-day have any just conception of the bloody rebellion against the world, which originated and kept up the Dark Ages for more than a thousand years, while murdering more than a million mediums under the witchcraft law of barbarian Judaism, which the Roman imposture sanctified in its bogus Bible.

The Progressive Thinker should be sustained in its noble effort to hold up this historic warning before the world, that all may see the plain alternative before us—are you for the angel world that calls us up to heaven, to love and to wisdom, or are you for the Roman conspiracy that walled out heaven and gave us instead its terrific panorama of an imaginary Hell and an imaginary Hell-God, whose only great achievement was to build an infinite furnace and establish near it a fertile world to raise a copious supply of human fuel for his furnace—a lie that one returning spirit could dispel.

The conspiracy that organized a church of Pagan ceremonies and Pagan creeds, and after running it a hundred years, compiled a Bible out of all the world's superstitions, and stolen fragments of distorted apostolic writings, to justify its usurpation, still has its hold upon the world by means of that Bible which impose upon helpless infancy.

It is necessary to state these truths over and over again, and prove them as I have proved in "Primitive Christianity," to clear the field for the triumphant entrance of Spiritualism, which is the dawn of light, liberty and wisdom.

The world has had many institutions and creeds called religions, that have all been signal failures. For the test of true religion is its ability to elevate the life of the individual and the nation toward the divine ideal, which would establish universal brotherhood, justice and love, resulting in universal prosperity.

As no religion has ever done this, we must begin anew, and the nineteenth century is about to begin, for it is sufficiently advanced to see its hopeless condition, if it prolongs the failures of more than five thousand years of superstition for religion, as expressed by churches, stands to-day in darkness, as geology, chemistry and astronomy stood five hundred years ago.

Buddhism has been much admired for its principles of benevolence, but it is not an enlightened religion, for Buddhism is blind, knowing nothing of the spirit world or of God. Brahminism is equally blind, and the two religions together have degraded women and degraded all India to national helplessness, suffering now from famine and pestilence. The Confucian religion of China has kept that nation in intellectual darkness, in moral and intellectual stagnation.

The Mohammedan religion, as seen in Turkey, is intellectually stagnant, politically despotic, intolerant and cruel.

The religion of the Christian church can claim no higher character, for it has been blood-thirsty through fifteen centuries, and it has ever been identified with the maintenance of despotism, of war, and of the oppression of the laboring classes.

And all four of these national religions have been identified with the oppression and degradation of women, which means the degradation of all mankind, for the status of every nation is determined by the status of woman and hence the one nation in all antiquity that honored women and gave her justice rose to the highest rank in civilization. That nation was Egypt.

ALL RELIGIONS FAILURES.

In the freedom of the 19th century we are now able to say that all national religions have been signal failures, and it is time that we should have a new and live religion that will not be a failure, but will redeem the wrongs and calamities of countless centuries of ignorance, war and despotism.

The churches that represent the world's religions are all without exception the surviving remnants of ancient superstition from three to ten thousand years old, and I have offered to demonstrate this in reference to the so-called Christian church, if any clergyman dare deny it. They may not face the issue openly, but I shall prove it at any rate, in the second volume of Primitive Christianity.

The world's churches or religions are all the allies of despotic power and which civilization and science have not been able to overcome, and at this moment they stand firm as ever against the people and deny the right of self-government and freedom to the inhabitants of Cuba, Crete, Armenia and the Philippine Islands, which they insist must continue under the rule of robbery and murder by foreign powers. The Holy Alliance of Europe decrees it while professing to be Christian, and Greece alone, in the spirit of Marco Bozzaris, is ready to die in defence of liberty. The venerable Gladstone, although a Bibliolator, has manhood enough to denounce the barbarity of all Christendom. Its leading church sanctions the shameless butcheries in Cuba and repeats in Spain to-day the cruel tortures of the Inquisition.

Jesus rebelled against the ecclesiastic despotism of his day, and the only hope of redemption for the coming centuries lies in the similar rebellion against ecclesiastical despotism, beginning now as modern Spiritualism.

Jesus taught the democracy of brotherhood, as ably illustrated by Ridpath in the last Arena. He shows how it was all destroyed by the Roman imperial church.

Democracy means justice to the masses, the producers of wealth, but under Biblical morality and Asiatic superstition, labor is conquered everywhere but in the United States, where it fights a losing battle. But the toiler is too enlightened now to submit, and I beg leave to express my anticipation (on this 8th of March) of the coming conflict. Cuba will be free, for though Cleveland and Olney held it down, the present more American and manly administration will soon have a war with Spain—I believe in less than six months; and the heroism of Greece in resisting the power of Christian Europe, as it calls itself, will break up the Holy Alliance. Russia, England, Italy, Germany and Spain are approaching war, France may not be able to keep out of it, and the democracy of Europe will not be idle while Turkey realizes its long-expected downfall.

With one to three millions continually suffering as never before, I don't believe we can maintain domestic peace more than thirteen or fifteen years longer, for the masses are continually becoming more desperate and the classes more unyielding and determined to rule. The signs of the times are read by many who expect a conflict sooner, but I feel the scientific certainty which comes from the law of Periodicity which I have just illustrated in a little book, showing that such a law rules our country.

Eternal conflict and war is the destiny of selfishness, as eternal peace and prosperity came from brotherhood. The false religions of human ignorance, human speculation and human arrogance in priestcraft have kept the world in a condition which may be called "the martyrdom of man," and they will prolong that martyrdom until they are all abolished.

In the heavenly world alone are the highest ideals of love and purity realized, and from that world must all exalted religion come.

The ignorance of that world, among Asiatic nations, and the positive rebellion against that world among European nations prompted and sustained by priestcraft, are the reasons that the world to-day is destitute of true religion, and has not even a first conception of what religion should be. But the eternal fountains of divine love and wisdom in the higher world are no longer walled out of earth-life, and every spiritual message enriches the souls of men with the life and joy of heaven, which expresses itself in perfect brotherhood.

That life and joy and heroic love came to earth near nineteen centuries ago, through the most perfect medium of divine love that the world has ever seen.

In Jesus Christ appeared a noble human soul, living in closer communion with the higher world than with earth life. He was not an expression of Jewish nationality or of any other type of earth life.

To him the superstitions, the ceremonies, the intolerance, the wars and the selfish ambitions of the Jewish nation were intolerable, and he cast them aside, knowing the peril he encountered, nor did the superstitions and the doctrines of Egypt, India, and Persia, with which he was well acquainted, have any influence upon him.

No religious teacher known in history was ever so original, so independent, so inflexible in the statement of truth before its enemies, so quick in intuition, so familiar with angelic presence, so highly sustained by angel power in fasting, toiling and healing; and without rank, wealth or power, so impressive to all who were around him, even to his enemies, and so often taken for a divine being by the superstitious. In spite of his denial and his assurance that his followers would be able to do all that he did and even more.

From long familiarity with his apostolic associates, I know that they were men of sturdy character, of unflinching mind, of firm integrity and unflinching courage, who accepted him as a wonderful inspired teacher, but not as a God.

He taught the only wise and perfect religion the world has ever heard, and modern science cannot improve upon it.

But the religion of Jesus Christ did not survive the century to which he gave it. It never became one of the national religions, and it for the world has accepted the counterfeit gospels manufactured a hundred and forty years after his life and death by the Pagan priests of Rome.

The Christianity of Jesus recognized no Trinity, no transubstantiation, no ordained Sabbath, no Garden of Eden myth, no angry and ferocious God, no devils nor hell, no judgment day and burning world, no resurrection of human bodies, no salvation by the blood of atonement, and none of the impossible miracles recorded in the Roman Testament. His teaching was as rational as it was tender and loving, and his religion established a rational and democratic brotherhood among men, forbidding every species of priestly authority. If any of these superstitions had been taught by Jesus and his apostles, I would have classed their Christianity with the other false religions, and devoted my pen to its destruction. The wonder is that so pure and enlightened a religion could have appeared in the midst of a grossly superstitious race. It came because it found a proper channel—a man whom popularity could not entice and death not terrify. It was a direct transfer of the spirit of heaven to earth life, and his disciples were brought into close communion with heaven, through his teaching and their own mediumship and inspiration.

This was Spiritualism, on its loftiest plane—a religion for which his followers were willing to die if need be, and which they embodied in their devoted lives.

Modern Spiritualism begins at the foot of the mountain on which he and his disciples walked. It begins in curiosity and intellectual investigation, obtaining glimpses of truth, and steadily advancing; men see and comprehend moral truth long before they reduce it to practice in their lives, and I wonder when even a few will appear, ready to tread the lofty and dangerous paths in which the ancient disciples walked.

To them the love of mankind was an imperative duty which they could not neglect—could not shrink from. When they saw the nations sunk in ignorance, superstitions and cruelty, they did not wait for Christianity to become popular, they did not wait for a call or a salary, but went forth among tyrants and mobs, ready to be scourged, imprisoned, stoned and murdered, if such was their fate.

I hope there may be some to-day equally faithful and devoted, for the world needs the unflinching little army of heaven, as much to-day as it did in the days of the Cesars, and the times that "try men's souls" will come even to this generation. Our spiritual religion does not amount to much if we are not willing to make some sacrifice for it. And spiritual religion demands that we should do all in our power to save our country from ruin.

I most heartily endorse the excellent suggestions of Dr. M. E. Conger that we are bound to consider every question that concerns human welfare, instead of holding our Spiritualism as a mere intellectual luxury, to be obtained as cheaply as possible without even supporting a cheap spiritual newspaper. He who fails in that (unless compelled by poverty) has no right to the honorable title of Spiritualist. It is his first and easiest duty to keep the light burning.

The ancient Jews had a great deal of Spiritualism, but it was not religious. It was an earth-bound Spiritualism which had no elevating power. It left them in a life of turbulence, licentiousness, war, cruelty, intolerance, oppression of women, and superstition, subject to the influence of earth-bound spirits like themselves, and worshiping a low-grade spirit or a God. Their turbulent superstition and selfishness led to their destruction, which Jesus Christ foresaw and predicted.

A similar fate of convulsion and ruin is inevitable in every nation entirely dominated by the selfishness against which heaven protests. All over the world the doom of a race alienated from heaven is in progress. The laborer toils through a short and unsatisfactory life without education or comfort, the victim of the priest, the politician, the millionaire, the government and the soldier.

Republican constitutions and abundant land have only postponed our evil days a half century, and now the sentence of divine law against human selfishness is approaching its fulfillment, as I have shown in Periodicity.

The days of corruption foreseen and deplored by President Lincoln have arrived. He still has the same view, and has warned me of coming events. Every observer knows that wealth is now the supreme power, controlling elections, legislatures, Congress, and executive and judical officers generally. The New York Sun said that two-thirds of the voters in Delaware were purchasable, and if there is a city in the United States with a clean, honest government, I have not heard of it.

The days of calamity are beginning in earnest, and even Congress must know it, for Senator Teller told the Senate that our most splendid inauguration was accompanied by the most unhappy wretched condition of millions that has ever been known in America and Congressman Calderhead told the House:

"The whole United States is in a condition of unrest. The underhalf of the country believes that it is injured largely by the power of aggregated wealth. They actually believe it. They believe it to such an extent that large areas of the country need nothing but a leader of ability to give us an insurrection That is the truth, and that is the political storm that will foll any attempt direct or indirect, to incorporate the men named here into a private bank with a capital of millions of dollars, and the plea that it is done for the benefit of international commerce will not answer that mob—for it is a mob—which only needs a commanding general to lead it. If the leader should happen to have the military instinct it would mean civil war."

I have long foreseen these dangers, and many others foresee them now. I cannot live to the time of national convulsion, but I would like to show its certainty to those who still doubt it or propose to do nothing but wait.

The nation is sinking into distressing and alarming poverty, while the wealth of the lucy is increasing, demoralizing government, and making an arrogant aristocracy.

More than a million are kept idle by the loss of employment—this is the lowest estimate—two or three millions are believed by many to be suffering and suffering breeds demoralization and desperation. The amount of crime is increasing—for the last year we had more than one murder for every hour of the day and night—two thousand more—and not one in twenty punished unless by lynching, while more than half as many, from despair and suffering, have committed suicide. All other forms of crime, knavery and insanity show the same increase.

This is but the beginning of our dark days. For several years on an average fifty thousand farmers every year have lost their farms, becoming reduced to tenants and day laborers, when they can get employment, which many fail to do, and soon by our merciless laws are arrested as beggars or vagrants, glad even to find a home in a jail, instead of suicide.

Our social system of selfishness was called by Carlyle a "hell-scramble." It is a system of strife and monopoly which cannot fail to carry us further on the road to ruin. Poverty spreads like an epidemic and while farmers are losing their farms (50,000 annually a single American city has more tenants annually turned out into the streets by eviction than all Ireland and the army of the unemployed is continually increasing, not only by lockouts and strikes and stagnant business, but by invention and capital, as machines are introduced that supersede one-half, three-fourths or even nine-tenths of the hands engaged in any manufacture. There is no remedy for this. Soup houses and charity cannot meet the crisis.

I started once to portray our country's wretched condition for The Progressive Thinker by giving the established facts, but the task was too extensive for a newspaper writer, and I dropped my pen.

In such a crisis Spiritualists who recognize divine law should take the lead. But this essay is already too long I would like to give my views of the duty of all good men, and if The Progressive Thinker desires to receive them I would try to state them as concisely and clearly as possible.

The religion that could not save Palestine, because it was crushed, coming now in unfolding Spiritualism, may save this country when it has passed through its coming fiery trial.

San Jose, Cal., March, 1897.

VERY SIGNIFICANT.

The Progressive Thinker leads. It publishes more reading matter than any other dollar Spiritualist paper on this green earth. It was the only Spiritualist paper that had enterprise enough to publish President Barrett's address before the National Convention at Washington. It covered three pages of the paper. It now proposes to send out 1,000,000 copies of the paper containing his address.

Read the announcement on fifth page, headed "Fifteen Cents," for particulars.

SPIRITUALISM SCIENTIFICALLY DEMONSTRATED.

BY PROF. ROBERT HARE.

His Remarkable Researches Made in the Early Years of Spiritualism.

Directly Edited and Revised by Him, Now in Spirit-Life.

"H. C. Gordon, a clairvoyant, interpreted the characters as follows: The first line, 95th Psalm, 2nd verse; second line, 3rd and 6th verse; and the third line, the 10th verse.

"Certain characters were found on the wall in the east chamber, on Sunday morning, May 4th, 1851. They were made with a candle on the wall near the south window.

"These were translated to be, 'Spirits of a higher order desire to communicate with you soon.'

"Spirit-writing, without visible human agency, has never been a common mode of communicating, although it was among the early occurrences at Hydesville, Rochester, and Auburn.

"Sometimes these missives were enclosed in a book, and thrown down stairs or into the room; sometimes wrapped about a key or nail, or anything that would give a momentum, and thrown into the room. Often they were seen to fall from above; this occurring frequently when the doors were closed, and it was not possible for any visible agent to have been the cause. Writing would appear on the wall at times made, as it appeared, with a pencil. On one occasion, Dr. Phelps was writing at his desk, and, turning his back for a few moments, without leaving his chair, turned again to his paper, where he found written in large letters, 'Very nice paper and very nice ink for the devil.' The ink was not dry, the desk was not two feet from him as he sat, and he was entirely alone in the room.

"About the first of May, Dr. Phelps of Boston, brother of the Rev. Doctor, and Prof. Phelps, of Andover, a son of the Rev. Doctor, went to Stratford to 'expose the humbug,' and with a full belief that it was a trick of evil minded persons, and that they should be able to detect and expose it without trouble; and they were disappointed, as hundreds have been under like circumstances. On Tuesday evening a loud rap was heard on the back door, seeming to be made by the knocker, loud enough to be heard twenty rods distant. The servant went to the door, but no person was there. After the lapse of five or eight minutes, the rap was repeated. It was then supposed that some one had done it mischievously; but, on looking about, no person was discovered. It was in the shades of evening, but not dark enough to prevent any person being seen, who might have done it, as easily as at mid-day. The knocking came the third time, when Dr. Phelps—the visitor—placed himself in the hall, perhaps four feet from the door, and the Professor, of Andover, took a position on the steps without, each having full view of the door. The same loud raps were repeated on the door between them. The knocker did not move, nor could the eye detect any cause for what met the ear. The noise was heard throughout the house, and both the gentlemen were positive that no visible agent was employed to produce it. About bed-time, a loud pounding was heard on the chamber-door. The gentlemen, each with a candle in hand, stood on either side of the door, as the pounding, as though done with a heavy boot, was continued. The noise appeared to each to be on the side of the door opposite to him. On the following morning, as Dr. Phelps, of Stratford, was standing at the foot of the stairs leading to the third story, a noise as loud and much resembling the report of a pistol occurred apparently close to his ear. These boisterous sounds occurred at intervals during a great part of the time that the distrurbance was continued. Sometimes for weeks they would not be heard; and again for days they were heard every day.

"It would seem, from various occurrences, that the agents of these sounds, whoever they were, must have been human beings, or, at least, possessed of all the leading characteristics of humanity. They were evidently influenced by kindness or unkindness, by respect and confidence, as persons generally are in this life. Some instances illustrating this are given. One morning, during the breakfast hour, they would push the table suddenly, raise it up one side and shake it in such a manner as to spill the coffee, and otherwise occasion serious inconvenience. A person at the table spoke to them in a tone of authority, commanding them to desist; but the act was at once repeated. Again they were commanded to cease, but increased violence followed this command. This was five or six times repeated, and the shaking was each time renewed. At length another person at the table said, 'I request you kindly to cease this annoyance, and allow us to take our breakfast quietly,' and they ceased at once, without a repetition. It was found, from this time, that kindness had about the same effect upon them that it produces upon mankind at large. A lady, the wife of a clergyman, spent a few weeks in the family during the summer, who received many communications from them, would often, when the scissors, thimble, or things of that kind, were mislaid, say, 'I will thank the spirits to return my thimble, scissors,' or whatever was missing, and the article named would drop at her side, or in her lap, within a minute. Things of this kind occurred very many times in the course of the time that these phenomena were continued. If a key or knife, or anything of the kind, was mislaid, and any person was looking for it, frequently it would be thrown to them as though their wants were anticipated. Dr. Phelps was once with Harry in the stable, when the curry-comb could not be found, and he asked Harry where it was, to which Harry replied that he did not know. At that moment, the doctor saw it rise, as if thrown, from a point ten feet distant from them, and, describing a parabola, fall within a short distance of the spot where they were standing.

"About the middle of May, Dr. Phelps and Harry were riding to Huntington, a distance of seven miles. When they had proceeded about one mile on the way, a stone, about the size of a hen's egg, was thrown into the carriage, and lodged on Dr. Phelps's hat. Soon another and another were thrown in. The carriage was a covered one, and the back curtain was down, and there was no way a stone could have been thrown in by ordinary means. At one house where they stopped, the moment the front door was oppened, two stones were thrown, one of which entered the door as it stood partly open, and the other hit one of the lights of glass, and broke it. Harry was standing on the door-steps at the time, and there was no one in the street who could have thrown them. Two stones were also thrown against another house where they stopped of an errand. Sixteen stones were thrown into the carriage on the doctor's return, and, including those thrown against the two houses, twenty, in driving three or four hours.

"As it was now apparent that these strange things were in some way connected with Harry as a medium, it was thought best to separate him from the family. Accordingly board was obtained for him in a family some two miles distant. One day, when he came home, he told his mother, in great secrecy, that on the night previous he had been awakened from his sleep by some person dressed in white, whom he saw standing by his bedside. He was frightened, and was about to scream, when the person spoke and said, 'Be not afraid, my son; I am your father;' and then placed in the boy's hand a silver watch, and told him to wear it for his sake. The boy affirms that he had the watch in his hand; that is was not a dream; and that he was entirely awake; and that his father told him to tell no one of it but his mother and Dr.P. His mother told him it was nothing but a dream, and turned it off as a light affair.

"It seems that a valuable silver watch had been left the boy by his father, which was not in use, but had been kept locked up in a drawer of a dressing-table, to which he (Harry) had no access. A member of the family, having occasion to look into the drawer, saw the watch, and knows it was there, and that the drawer was locked, and the key given to Mrs. P. A few minutes after the conversation with his mother about the apparition and the watch, the night previous, he came in from the yard with the watch in his hand! He said his father had again appeared to him, and put the watch into his hand again, and said, 'Wear this for my sake.' He brought the watch into the house, and showed it to his mother, and said that his father said, 'Tell your mother to look at the second-hand.' The hand was off, and lay on the face of the watch under the crystal. A credible person will make oath, if called upon, that she saw the watch in the drawer, where it was usually kept, not more than six or eight minutes before, and that she locked the drawer and gave the key to Mrs. Phelps. The key had been in possession of no other person, and Harry had not been in the room during the time. The watch was taken to Dr. P., and he tried to replace the second-hand, but could not succeed. He closed it, leaving the hand loose on the face, and passed it back to Harry, saying that he must take it to the watch-maker. When he took it in his hand, he exclaimed, 'Why it's on!' They looked, and it was on and going. In a few minutes it was off again, and was put on a second time, all within a minute or two. The doctor affirms that it was not out of his sight a moment; that he knows the watch was not opened, and that no visible power was employed in doing it.

"On one occasion the piano-forte was played while it is known that no person was in the room; and, at another time, it was turned around, the front toward the wall, and so far removed from the side of the room as to allow the player room to sit next to the wall; the stool was also appropriately placed.

"On several occasions, about this time, certain members of the family saw, or thought they did, visible appearances. Dr. P. did not give entire credit to these statements; not but what he had full confidence in the honesty of the family, but the excited state in which some of them had been for a long time led him to think that they might imagine they saw what had no existence in fact. Toward the last of May, it was signified that one of the spirits who had communicated would appear visibly—first to the daughter, then to Mrs. P., and then the doctor himself. They asked in what manner he would appear, and the answer was, 'In a sheet.' Between ten and eleven o'clock the same night, soon after the family had retired, Anna, who occupied the east bedroom, the door between her room and that where the doctor and his wife slept being open, and a lamp burning on a stand so placed as to light both rooms, called to her mother, and said, 'There it is, in a sheet.' Dr. P. asked where when she said it was in the door between the two rooms, coming from the room the doctor occupied, but the doctor saw nothing. The daughter was, frightened, and covered up her head, and in a few minutes looked and saw nothing. He was represented as moving slowly from one room to the other.

"In about two minutes Mrs. Phelps exclaimed, 'There it is!' and drew the clothes over her head. Both the daughter and mother saw it this time, but still the doctor saw nothing, although in as favorable a position as either of the others.

"After two or three minutes had elapsed, the doctor also saw it. It appeared to him to move slowly from the hall chamber into his, and turn and move slowly back. It had the appearance of a very tall person with a sheet thrown around it; he saw only the sheet. In about one minute, something was thrown on to the bed, which proved to be a sheet which had been taken from the wardrobe in the hall. Dr. Phelps declares that he was not frightened in the least, and could not have been mistaken in the appearance. Some two or three weeks subsequent to this a similar appearance was seen, and Dr. P. sprang out of bed, determined to seize hold of it if possible. It came part way into his room, and then moved slowly back. The daughter affirmed that the doctor was within two or three feet of it when it disappeared, and a sheet dropped into a chair. These were the only instances in which the doctor saw anything himself. Others of the family saw persons in a mysterious way several times.

"Two or three days after this, a communication was given by use of the alphabet, saying that Root, a gentleman who had been in the house, had destroyed the doctor's book. He inquired 'What book?' and was answered 'The big book.' Yet he did not know what book was designated, and repeated the question and received the answer, 'The big book in the secretary.' Still it was not understood. Again was spelled, 'Look and see!' Dr. Phelps had in the secretary two blank books; in the larger one he had written a full account of the mysterious manifestations, in the form of a diary, and, having noted them as they occurred from day to day, they were recorded with more minuteness than could afterward be done. Upon looking, it was discovered that every page that had been written upon was torn from the book and gone. After a long search, the fragments of the leaves were found in the vault. Copies of the characters which the doctor had carefully taken, and felt anxious to preserve, were every scrap gone. There were, in a dressing-table drawer in the chamber, a great number of the notes sent. These were set on fire with a match and burned in the drawer. The fire was discovered by the smoke, but not until the papers were so far charred as to injure them beyond preservation. A few of these writings only are retained, which were in other places. The last of the annoyances was on the 25th of September, and was that of throwing ink upon the daughter's dress. She was standing on the piazza, near the front door; the window of the front chamber was open, from which was thrown a small bottle of ink. The ink went over her dress in a way to entirely unfit it for further use. There was no person in the chamber who would have done such a thing for mischief; and, indeed, no person in the house who would have been guilty of it.

"The young lady was just setting out for a visit at New Haven, from which she was anticipating much pleasure, and I cannot conceive of any feeling, short of sheer malevolence, that would prompt such an act.

"On the second day of October, the family, with the exception of Dr. Phelps and the cook, left Stratford to go to Pennsylvania. During their absence all demenostrations ceased, with what may be termed one exception. A letter, addressed by Dr. Phelps to Mrs. Phelps, contained when it reached her, some of the spirit-writing in pencil, saying that 'her husband was sick and wished her to return if she expected to see him alive.' He was then in good health; but the next week was sick and confined to his bed two or threedays. There may or may not have been some connection between the two occurrences. It was the design of Dr. Phelps to separate the family for a time, in order, if possible, to get rid of the annoyance; and for the five weeks he remained at Stratford, after the family had left, no disturbances took place. Harry stayed in Bucks county (Pa.) all winter, and the other members of the family lived in Philadelphia.

"In the month of March the family returned to Stratford. The house had been closed and under the charge of a neighbor, and no sign of any disturbance was visible, as every article of furniture was found just as they left it. About the fourth or fifth day after their return slight rapping was heard as they sat at the tea-table. They affected not to notice it, and the next day it was repeated more distinctly, but no response was made. Soon after, certain characters were found about the house, which were known, from the circumstances, to be of recent origin. Two or three days after, distinct communications were made by a spirit purporting to be Dr. Phelps's daughter, who died at the age of twelve years. On being questioned, this spirit could not give any evidence of identity.

"At another time certain characters were given, which were interpreted by the rapping as follows: 'Evil one has gone, and better one has come.' No communications were made after the early part of May, but some things occurred indicating their presence and desire for mischief.

"On the evening of the 18th of July, they set fire to some papers in the doctor's secretary, and some twenty papers and letters were burned before they were discovered. Fire was set at the same time to the papers in both the closets, under the stairs in the hall. They were discovered by the smoke. Two or three days after this, when some friends who had visited them were about to leave, their bonnets and some other articles could not be found, although search was made in every part of the house, until the train by which they were to go to New York had passed. They were at last found, locked into an enclosed washstand, in a way that made it morally certain that they could not have been placed there by human hands.

"On the 29th of July Harry left to spend some time at New Lebanon, N. Y., and during his absence no manifestations were noticed, although they were constantly on the look-out for something of the kind. Anna and her mother left for Philadelphia on the 25th of September, and they had been so long exempt from annoyances that they hoped they had ceased altogether. But Harry had the manifestations at New Lebanon, and there was first operated on, by invisible agency, to produce a magnetic sleep, into which he passed with a sudden shock. He had never been magnetized before, although frequent attempts had been made to do so. In this state he evinced all the phenomena common to good clairvoyance. On his return to Stratford, on the 9th of October, the sounds accompanied him almost constantly; but they seemed less inclined to mischief than formerly, because, as they said, 'Harry has passed to a higher state, where the low and ignorant spirits could not communicate with him.'

"On several occasions characters of a unique description were made. Some were written early in April, 1851, which Harry interpreted to read: 'We are to take our leave of you very soon.'

"Some were traced out with chalk on the piazza of the house, on the 31st of March, 1850.

"These Harry interpreted to mean: 'You may expect good spirits to come by-and-by.' The same characters had been said, by A. J. Davis, to read: 'Our society desires through various mediums to impart thoughts.' The spirit that seemed to be most prominent in all these communications claimed to be Harry's father, and sometimes a sister of Dr. Phelps, who died about three years previous to this; also a child of Dr. Phelps, who died more than twenty-two years before. The communications seemed generally to come from the boy's father. On the 12th of October he passed into a mesmeric state, and wrote some characters, which he translated as follows:

"'My dear children: I love you, and try to do everything that will do you good. Obey dear Mr. Phelps in every thing, for he knows what is right and what is wrong. This is the advice of your spirit father.'

"On the same paper were written others, which, being translated, read: 'You were troubled with evil spirits, but now they are no more. They have bid adieu, and good spirits have come and are with you all the time.'

"Again occur others, which read: 'You must not fear, brother, that you will be troubled with evil spirits any more. No, brother, no more.'

"'Your spirit sister, BLISS.'

"The person here supposed to communicate is a sister of Dr. Phelps, a widow, who left the earth-sphere in 1848, and by whom several of the previous communications are said to have been made. Other characters, of the same general formation, were made at the same time, but were not then translated.

"On the evening of the 12th, Dr. Phelps, Harry, and two younger children, were seated at a table; responses were frequently given by raps under the table. Dr. Phelps inquired if it would accommodate them at all to have some substance to rap with; to which they replied affirmatively. He threw down a table-knife; the raps seemed immediately to be made by striking the knife against the table-leaf, and soon it was tossed up on the table. A small tea-bell was then placed under the table; it was rung several times, and tossed on to the table as the knife had been. It was again put down, and returned as before; the same being repeated several times in succession. The light was then extinguished, and the candle put under the table with a match-box containing matches, and the spirits requested to light it. They distinctly heard the match drawn upon the bottom of the box, which was prepared with sand-paper for that use. All saw the light, but the first match went out. Again the scratching of the match was heard; it ignited, the candle lighted, and was placed upon the table! The experiment was repeated several times, with the same result; every precaution being taken to prevent collusion in the matter.

"On a subsequent occasion a large-sized tea-bell was rung under the table, then rose up, passed round the room, ringing violently all the way, and fell upon the table. The candle was in the closet, but the room was sufficiently light to make it certain that no person left the table to convey it. It was manifest that from the time Harry returned from New Lebanon the manifestations began gradually to subside. They were less frequent and less marked. It was arranged that he should accompany the family to Philadelphia, and go to a boarding-school at a town about twenty miles distant from the city. At different times he had been told that if he went there he would again be annoyed by bad spirits. The question was many times put, 'Will you annoy him again if he goes to the school?' A.—'We will not, but others will.'—'What others?' A.—'Those who were with him last summer.'—'Will they disturb him if he stays here and goes to the academy in Stratford?'—'No. They will will not disturb him while he is with you.'—'What will they do if he goes to Pennsylvania?' A.—'They will tear his clothes, destroy his books, and break his windows.'—'Can you not control those bad spirits, and prevent their doing him any injury?'—'No.'—'Will you do all you can?'—'Yes.' At another time Dr. Phelps inquired if they would not leave him, as his mother was so much opposed to the whole thing. 'Will you not, to oblige her, leave him, that he may be a medium no longer?' said the doctor. The reply was, 'If we leave him, evil spirits will get possession of him again.' These communications were made by what purported to be the boy's father. For two weeks previous to going to Philadelphia the manifestations had almost wholly subsided; perhaps only occurred when requested; and notwithstanding the repeated declarations that when he should leave for the school in Pennsylvania, the bad spirits would come in and make him trouble; it was determined to try the experiment, and on the 11th of November the family set out for Philadelphia, where they were to spend the winter, while Harry was to go to school. He remained with the family in Philadelphia about a week, where a few communications were given to Dr. Phelps in private. The spirits said they would begin to annoy the boy on the cars, on his way to the school, would pinch him and tear his clothes, so that when he got there they would be found torn, and that the troubles would follow him in the school as long as he stayed there. Dr. Phelps, under all the circumstances thought it best not to send him; but on consultation it was decided to have him go, and on the 19th of November he started for the school. Dr. P. went a mile or two with him, put him under the care of the conductor, and told him to report on his return if any thing worthy of notice occurred on the way. In two days the doctor was sent for to come and take him away. He said that soon after his father left him on the cars, he was pinched, pricked with pins, and annoyed in various other ways, until he reached his destination; that on his arrival there, he found that his pantaloons were torn in front, between the waistband and the knees, in two places, several inches in length. He changed them for another pair which were new and made of very substantial material, and these were torn down in front at least half a yard in length, before the doctor arrived there. The knockings had attended him in school and other places; his books were torn and damaged to the amount of two dollars, which the doctor paid. The family where he was had become alarmed, and would not keep him, and he was taken away. The boy stated that on one of the evenings, while he was there, he was walking in the street, when his cap was mysteriously taken from his head and thrown upon the sidewalk. As he stooped to pick it up he saw the flash of a gun at some distance, and a bullet passed over his back and struck a board fence near him. He was afterward informed by the rapping that, had he not stooped down, he would have been killed, and that his friendly spirit took this means to preserve him.

"Dr. P. now concluded to return with Harry to Stratford, and was told that the bad spirits would have no control over him there. The family in which they resided in Philadelphia had become alarmed at the strange occurrences, and finally they again returned to Stratford. From that time the disturbances began to subside, and by the 15th of December, 1851, they had ceased altogether. The family remained at Stratford till the spring of 1852, when they returned to their former residence in the city. The house at Stratford is occupied by another family, but no disturbances have ever occured with the family which now occupy the house, and none with Dr. P.'s family since the above date.

TRYING TO MAKE THE WORLD BETTER.

WOMAN'S HIGH MISSION—IMPORTANT SUBJECTS CONDENSED AND PRESENTED TO THE YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN OF THIS NATION, TO HELP EXALT AND GLORIFY OUR COMMON HUMANITY—HOW TO BE BORN AND GROW BETTER.

In the various moral, social, and religious associations, woman's influence and power are largely and graciously recognized, and where her opportunities have been equal, she has shown herself the cultured, pure loving, faithful, patient and abiding friend of man. In intellectual wealth and esthetic culture she has won as proud an eminence as man. On the rostrum, in the pulpit, as editor, reporter, accountant, as a teacher in schools and colleges, at the bar, in the hospital and dispensary, with deft magnetic and skillful hand, prescribing and applying medical and psychological potencies, she has stood the peer of man.

In her intuitive soul impressions of men and measures she is superior to man. Her highest crowning glory, however, is her ability to exalt and perfect her direct successors through her own organism—through parentage. In this her field is wonderful, and realized but by few. Physically and mentally sound and well in the spiritual powers of love, wisdom and affection, and maritally united to the man of her own intelligent choice, her power to renovate and exalt her issue is practically unlimited. Born right at first, there needs no second birth, only wise guidance and culture. She should understand the laws of heredity, and fully realize how her mental and moral forces thrill and electrify her child in embryo; how music, love, religion, joy, peace, sympathy, benevolent acts, baptize and photograph the young immortal beneath her warm, loving, motherly heart, through all its organism. How hatred, grief, jealousy, revenge, pride, discouraging toil, animal passion, anger, indolence, mental and physical, render brutal, ugly, savage, dull, malignant, and idiotic, what might have been lovely, peaceable, content, intelligent, angelic.

In this magnetic fountain of transformation, where angels or demons are chiseled into beauty or deformity, the Washingtons, the Franklins, the Gladstones, the heroes and heroines—the great, the good, the glorified were first moulded for the world's highest honors. The mother's power to build the foundation on which to rear the grand superstructure of a great soul in a sound body is vastly superior to man, although his is an important factor in the premises. His physical soundness, purity, honor, love, intelligence, energy, love of home and family, are esssential elements in the formation of a being who may be only a little lower than the angels.

Can a mother realize all this, and not feel her soul expand with the sublimity and greatness of her mission? How can she vitiate and desecrate this grand citadel of life? With what devout persistent effort should the young men and women of health and energy discipline and culture their mental, moral and physical powers, preparatory to the acceptance of so high and exalted a mission. Streams cannot rise above their source. Like begets like. Every child should be a positive improvement on its immediate ancestry. Steady progress on all lines should be the rule.

Impressibility is a marked feature of motherhood. Her sensibilities during embryonic development are largely intensified, and thus she becomes mediumistic, sensitive, and easily affected by surrounding influences, thus operates for weal or woe on posterity. This is entirely in harmony with natural law, and will eventually be recognized as the grandest agency known to humanity for the physical, mental and moral salvation of the race. Oh! woman! Sublime is thy mission. Mayest thou honor and glorify it.

Can any fail to see the divine benignancy of this instrumentality under the guidance of enlightened and cultured motherhood? The plastic and susceptible being beneath the beating, thrilling heart of the mother, is like the sensitive plate of the photographer—when conditions are favorable, receiving and fixing the image or influence of desired objects or agencies. Hence various physical surface marks, discolorations and deformities or ineffaceable lineaments of beauty. But psychological or soul marks are more numerous, positive and indelible. Beware! Surface marks are produced only by the hand when desires are strongest. Let this photographing be reduced to a scientific basis, so that results can be calculated with positive certainty, without haphazard or retrogressive results. Every young woman, every young man, is looking forward to that auspicious time when parentage shall be their crowning glory. This is right, if there be no diseased condition or wasted vitality; and wise provision has been made to make a little Eden on earth. If consumption, scrofula, insanity, rheumatism, or great nervous debility are hereditary on either side, they should scrupulously avoid matrimony. The evils they entail on posterity are unspeakable. Do not venture. The world is alread overburdened with apologies for men and women. Let no one enter this Holy of Holies too young, or in violation of the laws of health and happiness, lest premature decay, sorrow, suffering and death rest like a terrible nightmare upon their fairest hopes and prospects.

Most of my readers know how imperfectly prepared are the majority of young men and women to enter the marital arena and acquit themselves and their posterity with credit and honor. I cannot blame such. This all-important subject has not been brought to their attention, or has been entirely tabooed or laughed down. This will not do. This 19th century has much light to give on this subject. Painless Childbirth, by Dr. Dye, valuable and cheap, get it and read, also many others on same themes. They will prove of untold value in the direction of physical, mental and moral development, as which no other educational agency is so sacred, important and far-reaching in consequences, and on which there is so much ignorance. Blind instinct and passion have ruled in this direction without a rival. Progress has been made in stock-breeding, fruit culture, flori-culture, etc., but ante-natal culture and development of the human species have been largely relegated to the realm of ignorance and mystery. Must this always continue? Shall man, the last and grandest product of infinite wisdom and power be the last to enter the scientific field of progressive culture? How much better to have an introduction upon the stage of action, even surrounded by poverty, under this guiding light of the mother's power over the destiny of her offspring, than to tread the old beaten track, unillumined by the searchlight of the present. I apprehend the intelligence of this age will joyfully accept this gospel of physical and moral salvation.

There is nothing vicious, nothing sensual, nothing morbid, nothing wrong, in the study of this subject. It is something grand, ennobling, inspiring and sublime. I know that deep down in the heart of youth is the desire for self-improvement and enlarged and vigorous powers in their posterity. They only need to be convinced that a particular course is right, to move in that direction and stir a slumbering world. Upon theme more than all others rests the task of giving to a waiting world an exalted manhood and womanhood. The task of banishing from their homes and country war, intemperance and crime, and inaugurating instead a grand and noble brotherhood and sisterhood, whose mission will be the establishment of health, peace, love, culture, homes of taste, beauty and plenty and the Golden Age. This is the grand Mission of Mothers. May they devoutly, lovingly and conscientiously accept this sacred trust, as the Redeemers and Saviors of their race.

LAKE PLEASANT CAMP, MASS.

The summer camps are again becoming subjects of conversation, and already the early visitors to Lake Pleasant are preparing for their journey to that mecca of the Spiritualists, as soon as the snow has disappeared.

A friend asked me recently why I always in my notices about our camp spoke of it as popular or successful—whether it was simply to laud the place, or was it really popular and successful; and a few remarks on this subject might be timely.

It is true that the management of Lake Pleasant wish to boom the camp, but not at the expense of truth and veracity. Success is very easy to grasp, if one have only the will and perserverance, for "nothing succeeds like success, and during the last two years of general depression everywhere, dear old Lake Pleasant has been popular and a success. In 1895 besides paying current expenses the management paid up a debt of $1,300. Last season the Camp-Meeting Association issued bonds to the amount of $10,000, but found it necessary to sell less than half of them to pay off all mortgages and debts, though $8,000 worth had been subscribed for, and to-day Lake Pleasant, the oldest and largest camp-meeting ground in New England dedicated to the promulgation of Spiritualism, and to that alone, is owned by Spiritualists who are lot-owners and annual campers there, with a credit which is, as President Daily stated at the Directors' meeting, almost too good. As for the truth of its popularity, why should it not be popular? This year, as in years past, we have engaged the best lecturers and mediums in the world to grace our platform. Not mediums who are endowed with excellent medinl powers only, but who also stand high for intellectual ability and morality. Music lovers will be attracted by the band concerts which will be given twice every week-day and three times on Sundays by an organization that stands among the highest in the State, the Fitchburg Band, the orchestra of which will furnish music for the dances to be given every afternoon and evening during the season. The band concerts are free to all campers and visitors to the grounds.

Excellent boating and fishing privileges can be enjoyed by lovers of those sports, and the lovely drives to points of interest in the vicinity, such as Mt. Toby, Poet's Seat, Pine Waunagen, Amherst, the prettiest college town in America. Old Deerfield and South Hadley of Indian war fame attract many on account of the lovely mountain and woodland scenery.

Lake Pleasant is emphatically the resort for people of moderate means as well as of the well-to-do. Rooms can be hired at prices ranging from $2.50 to $5 per week; board from $3.50 to $5. Tents for the season, well furnished, are let for $15 and $20; while the cottages rent at from $30 to $65. All railroads furnish excursion rates to the camp, and all visitors are cordially welcomed and made to feel at home. In fact, Lake Pleasant owes much of its popularity to the freedom from exclusiveness which at the other fashionable summer resorts is generally so prevalent. The management exercises much care in granting licenses to those wishing to conduct stores or entertainments, and our dances are noted all over the country for the culture and fine appearance of the hosts of young people who congregate in the Temple and pavilion every evening, and for the excellence of the management.

The National Spiritualists' Association and the State Association will each hold mass-meetings at the camp this season.

SCIENTIFIC LECTURES—PROF. W. M. LOCKWOOD GIVES TWO INTERESTING ADDRESSES IN THE GRAND ARMY HALL.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood, the eminent scientist, of Chicago, opened a course of lectures in Grand Army hall Sunday, giving two scientific discourses before the Norwich Spiritual Union. The subject treated in the afternoon was "The Spiritual Forces in Nature and How They Promote the Visible." The evening topic: "The Spiritual Hypothesis; or, The Philosophy of Co-Relations."

Prof. Lockwood introduced some experiments with the electropoise, demonstrating the principles of attraction and repulsion as the basis of polarity. He affirms that all compound expressions of matter can be reduced to invisibility. Hence the use of the term spiritual as applied by the ancient alchemist and noted by the modern physicist is only a term expressive of the elemental and invisible forms of what we call matter. That matter and spirit are identical, since spiritual forces combine to promote the visibility or phenomenon of form. Therefore a study of the forms evoked by nature can only be understood as an investigation of how spiritual or elemental forces combine to promote form. And as all matter is polarized and highly tensioned, much more so than the popular mind has understood, a principle of electro and magnetic reciprocity unite in sublime rhythm the expressions of time and space.

Prof. Lockwood affirms that were it not for the principle of polarity promoting what we call affinity there would be no such thing as the co-relation of force and the conservation of energy, and no transference by electro process.

That this principle of polarity is absolutely automatic can be demonstrated, and any miraculous interference of Omnipotent caprice in changing or overruling this inherent principle of action and reaction and subjugating it to other mode of motion would result in a greater disaster to the universe than the sudden halt of this planet in its daily rounds through the nebula of space, since the rhythm of nature would be broken up and chaos imminent. Action and reaction is the formula of nature, and principles of polarity unite in universal co-relation all expression of cosmic energy.—The Norwich (Ct.) Record.

FIFTEEN CENTS!

PROF. BARRETT'S ADDRESS.

Other Subjects Treated of Especial Interest.

The Progressive Thinker is to be sent three months for 15 cents to all New subscribers.

Spiritualists, keep posted in current Spiritual events.

Why remain in ignorance? Why don't you keep posted in regard to the great Spiritualistic movement? Prof. Barrett delivered an address before the National Association of Spiritualists. It was an important one, and should be read by every Spiritualist in this broad land. We have had his address (which covers three pages of The Progressive Thinker) and five other important lectures and articles embodied in one paper, which we propose to send forth to illuminate the minds of those who have not had an opportunity to read them.

The first page of this paper contains he lecture by Col. Ingersoll, given in a Chicago puipit. It scintillates through out.

The second page contains a highly interesting lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on the "Dwellings of the Dead."

The third page has a splendid article on "Science versus Theplogy," in review of Andrew D. White's two superb volumes.

The fourth page has another excellent lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on "Spiritual Unfoldment."

The fifth page is very suggestive throughout, and is devoted to the "Hindoo Teachers—They Will Try to Capture the United States."

On the sixth page commences Prof. Barrett's admirable address, occupying three pages.

We will also, in connection with this paper, send out another equally as valuable. The first page contains an excellent lecture by Virchand R. Gandhi, a learned Hindoo. The remaining seven pages contain the wonderfully thrilling narrative (founded on facts) entitled, "The Night the Light Went Out," exhibiting many of the inside workings of the Catholic Church. Besides the address by Mr. Ghandi and the remarkable narrative, "The Night the Light Went Out," the first page has an excellent communication obtained through Ouija. The second page has a startling statement in reference to the "Romish Octopus—It Is Winding Its Poisonous Coils Around Washington." The poem on the same page, "The Sad Picture of a Wrecked Human Life," is wonderfully suggestive. The third page has a striking illustration showing how the Romish Church treats heretics. This page and the fourth also have a continuation of the "Romish Octopus." The fifth page has that remarkable poem, "St. Peter At the Gate." Every freethinker should read it. It is full of excellent "points." It also contains interesting facts in reference to the Romish Church and offices. The sixth, seventh and eighth pages have the following: "Monasteries and Convents—Where Those Alive Are Entombed." "Rider Haggard and the Immuring of Nuns." This paper alone is well worth the price of a year's subscription.

Every Spiritualist in this broad land should have these two papers. Our regular subscribers have already read their contents. For Fifteen cents we will send the Progressive Thinker for three months to all New trial subscribers and also send these two valuable papers.

Bear in mind that by New subscriber we mean one who has not been on our list for at least three months. Those of our present subscribers who wish to buy these two papers can have them both now for five cents. All of our regular subscribers have read their contents.

Send The Progressive Thinker three months to some friend, and thus get him interested in the cause. Stamps taken on small orders.

We sincerely hope that no Spiritualist will be dishonest enough, or so dishonorable, as to take advantage of this offer, by continuing his paper when the time expires, in the name of some member of his family (or some one else) in order to get the benefit of this 15 cent offer, on which the publisher does not make a cent.

VERILY, WHAT NEXT?

Under the head of "A New Programme," we announced a radical new departure from the general routine of work assumed by the average Spiritualist paper. We do not follow old established usages unless we are thoroughly convinced that they are the best, which is very rarely the case. We established the original dollar Spiritualist paper, and introduced a new era in the line of Spiritualistic journalism. Others have followed after us, but in all candor the only thing in which they have equalled us, is in the price of the paper—one dollar.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker on the following terms:

The Encyclopaedia of Death and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. The Next World Interviewed at 35 cts. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	$ .45
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	.45
The Next World Interviewed	.35
Total	$1.25

NO. OF PAGES IN EACH BOOK.

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	400
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	400
The Next World Interviewed	250

Each of these books is neatly and substantially bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and as prices go, are well worth one dollar per volume.

Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker.

Remember, please, that in order to obtain these three books for $1.25, you must send along a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker; the paper one year, and the three books costing $2.25. It is the subscription to the paper that enables us to send you these three books at cost.

We go to press early Monday morning, and items must reach us as early as Friday or Saturday in order to have immediate insertion.

Communications must always be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer, or no attention will be paid to them.

L. M. Rose writes: "At least sixty persons testify to their belief in the genuineness of the phenomena presented by Mrs. L. A. Roberts and her son, of 107 South Leavitt street, Chicago, at six seances given in Elgin, Ill. Twenty-five or more different persons were identified by feature, form, color of hair, eyes, or by names and facts unknown to any one else in the seance. Some of the best seances were given at private houses with improvised arrangements."

Mrs. A. L. Morris writes from Chesterfield, Ind., of seances with George Runyan, at Muncie, Ind.: "At one seance one good old brother sang a hymn in which the whole band of spirit voices joined, male and female, singing above our heads. To say it was beautiful beyond description cannot express it. Trumpet talk was also a feature of this, as in all of Brother Runyan's circles. The trumpet control, Johnny Batson, is very intelligent and conscientious; he does not pose as a 'Wisdom Spirit,' and then talk nonsense, but calls himself an ardent student, and does give intelligent answers to any questions asked him."

Mrs. M. Bird thinks it was the test mediums that first demonstrated the truth of life beyond the grave, rather than the grand, silver-tongued speakers that could sway the crowded halls with their magnetism. The test medium, though perhaps uneducated, woke us to a realization that the loved ones still lived. No speaker could have done this—nothing but a convincing test could prove it to us. Let philosophy and phenomena go hand in hand to do battle for truth.

Mrs. E. E. Cowley writes an account of her troublesome experience with obsessing spirits, and states that she found deliverance trough the efforts of Mrs. May Cain, of Steubenville, Ohio, whom she recommends to all sufferers similarly afflicted.

Criticus writes from San Francisco, Cal.: "I attended Mr. Earle's seance last Sunday night. He is the most wonderful platform medium I have ever seen. It would take two or three thousand words to give an idea of the marvelous tests given at one of his meetings. We have four wonderful mediums on this coast: Edward K. Earle, Fred Evans, Maude L. Freitag and Dr. Schlessinger. The latter is getting better every week. Both his meetings at Washington hall and his private tests are free to all. His hall, which is a large one, is packed to hear him every Monday night. His example is a noble one."

Mrs. E. J. Bowtell writes from Canton, Ohio: "At a recent seance given in this city, Messrs. Miller and Renner being the mediums, the manifestations were of the most interesting nature, bringing to some hearts present the sad pleasure of greeting those loved ones whom they cannot now behold in mortal life. Either one of these mediums mentioned stand so far within that debatable ground between the two worlds, that spirits of many and varied characteristics can present themselves. Imagine, then, what their unite forces produced. A little child first made its presence known by a slight whisper, and then came an etherealization with fair flowing hair, the friends of daily life who have just stepped off this plane of existence, and lastly, the big Indian chiefs who roamed this very ground in all their native majesty less than a century ago, and now come to impart to their pale-face friends some of that strength which comes to those who are close to Nature's heart."

Prof. J. Madison Allen has received an appointment as State Agent of the N. S. A., for the Southern District of Missouri.

J. W. Ring writes from Galveston, Tex.: "The advance of Spiritualism in this section is doubtless as rapid as anywhere. Miss Lydia Allen, N. S. A. missionary, visited us not long since, and the largest audience that ever assembled in this place to hear Spiritualism attentively listened to her highly instructive lecture."

The lyceum at Springfield, Mo., is vigorously pushing ahead. Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Folsom write: "They have sixty-three members and getting new ones every meeting. Money in the treasury enough to pay all expenses and for some time to come." This lyceum has just supplied itself with the Lyceum Guide, and is officered with the best material. The interest in the lyceum is everywhere awakening.

W. G. Woodall writes from Littleport, Pa.: "We think this is a good field here for a good medium—test, trumpet or materialization. There are a number of towns here, including Littleport, that are anxious for investigation. They have had just enough to begin to understand the wonders of Spiritualism, and want to understand more of it. We think a medium can do well from a financial as well as a spiritual standpoint. I think it is a splendid field for missionary work."

Geo. W. Walrond writes from Denver, Colo.: "I am very sorry to record Mrs. Wagner's departure from Denver, Colo., for Omaha, Neb. During her stay here she had endeared herself to many hundreds of truth-seekers and Spiritualists. The secret of Mrs. Wagner's popularity lay in the fact that in all things she was a woman first and a medium afterwards. She took a great interest in the children's lyceum and public work generally, and gave of her mediumship freely at all these gatherings. I only trust she will enjoy the change and return to Denver again."

J. C. F. Grumbine has had over two hundred students for the season of 1897 and '98 in the class of psychometry alone. His other classes in clairvoyance and inspiration are equally large. Development is a specialty with Mr. Grumbine and his guides, and it is to be hoped that he will have large classes at his home school, 7820 Hawthorne avenue, Auburn Park, Chicago. He can be seen about development Mondays at 2 and 7:30 p. m., only. He will be at home April 5. See his announcement on the last page. Send for the new 8-page booklet containing his photogravure, enclosing a stamped and addressed envelope.

M. E. Van Luven writes: "Since 'all things come to those who wait,' the Spiritualists of Oakland, Cal., have embraced a long-delayed opportunity to build a genuine organization named the Union Spiritual Society, the 'cornerstone' of which was laid by Mr. Thos. G. Newman, president of the State Association; Mrs. Drynan, grand organizer of the N. S. A.; Mrs. Cowell and Mrs. Wrenn, local mediums of note, on Sunday, March 14. The officers were elected as follows: Prof. B. K. Lowe, president; Mr. L. M. Martell, vice-president; Mr. S. Palinbaum, treasurer; Mrs. L. W. Knott, organist; Mrs. M. E. Van Luven, secretary; Mrs. Dunham, Mrs Baldwin and Mr. H. B. DeMooy, board of directors. Articles of incorporation, constitution and by-laws, and a charter will soon be adopted. The order of Sunday services will be a general conference in the afternoon, with lectures and tests in the evening, for which the best talent attainable will be engaged. Mediums and all workers in the field of labor are cordially invited to attend all meetings. Those wishing engagements will please correspond with the secretary, and unless universally renowned, must appear before the officers and board of directors before the final engagement. The angel world has waited long and patiently for this united effort to be made, and the parents of the coming generation of Spiritualists have as anxiously waited for the right opportunity to establish a progressive lyceum in which to teach the children all branches of ethical culture and a knowledge of the living truth. Therefore, we believe that the Spiritualists of Oakland desire more than all else to have one good liberal society in which all can have a voice in its management and in which all will feel the liberty that Spiritualism demands. The hour is fully ripe for this movement and none too soon to prove a grand success. President Newman stated that there was no such word as fail to determined, united efforts. Mrs. Drynan's words were full of sympathy for the world's poor. She said, since heartrending scenes are a daily occurrence in the cities, of the rich rolling through the streets in chariots and the starving poor, footsore and weary, marching the walks with no work nor where to lay their heads at night, it is high time that the bigotry and superstition of dogmas and creeds slink into the shadows of the dark ages and the light of Spiritualism take its place."

Frank T. Ripley can be engaged for camp-meetings and grove meetings anywhere for the season of 1897, to speak and give tests.

Lyman C. Howe has engaged with the society at Flint, Mich., for the Sundays of April, and probably May, and will answer calls for week evenings at accessible points. Terms suited to the times. Mr. Howe has also engaged for the annual picnic at North Collins, Erie county, N. Y., June 5 and 6. He has July free, and the last ten days of August.

The Band of Harmony will meet with Mrs. Mitchell, 772 Walnut street (West Side), Thursday April 1. Inspirer, Margaret Fuller. Subject: "The Higher Humanity."

Will C. Hodge, inspirational speaker, has the months of April and May open, and will make very liberal terms for engagements. Address No. 3 Elizabeth street, Chicago, Ill.

E. C. Getsinger, scientist, of Detroit, Mich., who has originated a new philosophy of creation, based upon vibrations, is in Chicago at present lecturing to classes in Masonic Temple Hall 810, in the afternoon, on Tuesdays and Thursdays each week; also at 2910 Indiana avenue, Tuesday and Friday evenings. His course of lectures consists of nine lectures, fourteen subjects of the physical sciences. He promised the readers of The Progressive Thinker several years ago that he would in time confer with professors of universities as to the soundness of his views. This he has done and his premise remains unrefuted, and the professors of science are awaiting his book which he will write this summer. Those interested in the particulars of his lectures can write him at 3111 Michigan avenue, and receive a synopsis.

J. J. H. writes from Unionville, Mo.: "We now have in our midst J. M. White, of Joplin, Mo., and on the 25th we had some demonstrations of spirit power. As a medium for dates, names and test work, we have never had a better one in our midst than he is. The lectures given through his organism by Brigham Young and others are equal to anything ever had in this town. This control is working for the salvation instead of the destruction of the human family, and is redeeming his earth record by his lectures and tests. Our society here is in a flourishing condition."

B. V. Cushman, president, writes: "The Spiritual and Ethical Society of New York celebrate the anniversary on Sunday, April 4, 2:30 p. m., our only meeting that day. We have an excellent programme and expect to have a grand day."

The Eleventh Ward Political Equality Club and Woman's Suffrage Society meets at People's Institute, Leavitt and Van Buren Street, Tuesday, March 30th, at 8 p. m. prompt. Dr. Randall will address the ladies on that evening. Madam Bourgeois will assist in the musical part of the entertainment. A general invitation extended to all.

Horatio Nelson, of Chicago writes: "I desire to call your attention to the quiet work which has been going on at 2970 Indiana Avenue, for the past four months as conducted by Mrs. Edith E. R. Nickless. She has done good work. The higher teachings of the spiritual philosophy as given by herself, together with the inspirational addresses from those in the higher life, have been the means of awakening many to walk in the truth and to endeavor to bring forth those Christ-like traits of character that all should possess. By her walk and example she has caused many to become strict vegetarians, to give up the use of intoxicants and tobacco. Her circle of harmony held on Sunday afternoons where the teachings of Christ were given in all their purity is very likely to bring several mediums into the field at no very distant day. Then her Thursday evening class for the higher teachings of the Science of Life have been largely attended and growing in interest from the start. It is with deep regret that we have to announce her departure for Anderson, Ind., to take part in the anniversary exercises and to remain there for a month or more or until she is called elsewhere."

J. J. Johnson writes: "After the usual vacation the First Spiritual Society of Toledo, Ohio, again resumed its labors for the 'Fall' and 'Winter' under the able leadership of their pastor, Mrs. Dr. Wyant. The meetings have been a great success, many being turned away at times for want of room. The lectures have been very instructive, interesting and grand; also the tests which have been some of the most wonderful in the history of the society, and the Doctor certainly deserves great credit and is without doubt one of the most successful speakers and test mediums before the public. The anniversary of the advent of "Modern Spiritualism" being at hand, it will be observed by a special address, etc., appropriate for the occasion."

J. M. White writes from Unionville, Mo.: "Mr. Amae Wheeler, the voice, slate-writing and trumpet medium, gave a trumpet seance in this city, March 25th, to private parties, twelve persons being present. The phenomena which occurred was wonderful, some five trumpets being used. While the trumpets were floating around the room, independent voices were heard in addition to those coming from the trumpets. Touches of hands and spirit lights also were a prominent feature of the seance, and Mr. Wheeler's voice being heard in conversation while the spirit voices were manifesting."

G. R. G. writes: "C. C. Gillette has been holding circles the past few Sundays at different Spiritualists' homes, in Fletcher and Fairfax, Vt., with good attendance and good results. He has been exercising his gifts mostly in a private way, the time not arriving yet for him to step out into public work. He is a good medium for the communications of spirits with their earth friends. He gives the names and goes into detail of circumstances largely. He is very sympathetic in his nature, and very free with his gifts, and were he to have the proper time and chance could do much good. All who know Dr. Bronson may be glad to hear that he is a constant visitor at Mr. Gillette's circles, at home or away. He says he is very much interested in Mr. Gillette's mediumship; in fact he was when in earth life."

Julia Steelman-Mitchell writes from Milwaukee: "Here in the Cream-city we find a society of most excellent people, a handsome hall, and efficient officers. Mrs. Flora Jackson, a lady of culture and intelligence, is president. Our second Sunday here brought out a crowded house, notwithstanding there are four other societies holding meetings in the city. G. H. Brooks, who preceded us, has done a good work here, and we can predict for the Unity Society a long and useful career. Our week-days for March are all engaged in the smaller towns north. Will engage for one or more lectures for week-days of April on line of railroad. I go to Missouri for a course of lectures and seances in May. Shall have three weeks of that month to engage with individuals or societies, for one or more lectures in the above State. Have June open for engagement. Address 558 Milwaukee St.

NEW YORK CONVENTION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

Delegates have been elected from different sections, and it is hoped that all localities as well as societies will make a special effort to be represented in the State Convention, which is to convene at Syracuse, N. Y., Tuesday, April 13th, at 10 o'clock a. m., and continue for three days. Look over the last few numbers of The Progressive Thinker, and see what has been said on the subject. We need organization to enable us to unify our forces, that more may be accomplished without so much waste of energy, that unwise legislation may be prevented by the reason of the influence of numbers. It will give us standing and legislators respect us, as they do other organizations. There should be no need of presenting any arguments in its favor, for it seems as if it ought to be self-evident to everyone.

Don't forget that you can secure reduced railroad and hotel rates, and above all send one or more delegates to represent your community. It will pay you to go for the treat that is in store. Visitors from other States are requested. Don't wait for some one else to move, but put your shoulder to the wheel and help make it a success by stirring up our people in your locality. If you cannot get a meeting, have ten or more Spiritualists in your vicinity sign an appointment of some one to represent them as a delegate, and if necessary try and raise a sum of money to help pay the expense.

For blank credentials and further information address the undersigned.

The Buffalo Mass-Meetings held the 19, 20, 21, were a grand success, owing to the generosity of Mrs. Dr. J. H. R. Matteson and others with the splendid lectures by President H. D. Barrett, Vice-President Cora L. V. Richmond, Trustee Hon. L. V. Moulton of the N. S. A., Mrs. A. E. Sheets, vice-president Michigan Association, Lyman C. Howe (that veteran worker), E. W. Sprague, G. W. Katesand wife and spirit through the mediumship of Homer Altemus and Mrs. Kates. Sweet music was rendered by Mr. Altemus, Miss Blanche Fisher, of Farnham, and others. There was raised in cash and pledges over $800 for the N. S. A. and local societies and a renewed interest created for the cause in Buffalo. The meeting was under the auspices of the N. S. A. and the First Spiritual Church of Buffalo.

IN RE DR. NICHOLS.

To the Editor:—If the Dr. Nichols referred to in the current issue of your paper is Dr. T. L. Nichols, author of "Esoteric Anthropology," and other works, the writer, although not personally interested, can give the information that seems to be lacking concerning him.

In the sixties Dr. Nichols started a hydropathic sanitarium just outside of London, where he continued to work for more than a quarter of a century, contributing articles to hydropathic and other journals during all that period. He has never been lost sight of. For the past four or five years, in consequence of failing physical health and advancing years, he has been residing quietly with his step-daughter and her husband in Brighton, fifty miles south of London. Yours for enlightenment,

ANGLO-AMERICAN.

A STARTLING FACT.

The Progressive Thinker was the only Spiritualist paper that had the enterprise to publish Prof. Barrett's address before the National Association Convention of Spiritualists We have his address, covering three pages, and five other fine addresses and articles, one by Col. Ingersoll, grouped in one paper, and we want to send out 1,000,000 of them. It is worth ten times its weight in gold.

J. C. F. Grumbine in his criticism of the National Spiritualists' Association says: "I, for one, am willing to let Spiritualism and Spiritualists run the gauntlet of the world's severest tests of merit by the intrinsic worth of the religion and its advocate. No religion can be quicker advanced than by the consecration and spirituality of its followers." He thinks the National organization should be an organization for business only—not for propaganda.

"It is time the ballots began to talk," suggests Wm. Foster. Yes, when there is danger that the rights of Spiritualists will be restricted. They then should talk in a voice of thunder.

Mrs. M. Ham's spirit passed into the first sphere while her body was at home. "It was a barren country with nothing to see but small one story shanties." She might have mistaken the sandy plains of California for the first sphere—the way she pictures it.

Dr. E. D. Babbitt, M. D. says: "For 28 years I have dwelt near the open window of heaven, and have also aimed at earthly science so as not to run wildly into the ideal." Pretty near heaven, that open window.

Just outside the city of San Diego, on Point Loma, a narrow ridge dividing the bay from the ocean, is soon to be built a school for the revival of the lost mysteries of antiquity.

"That small voice within, yet which sometimes speaks so loudly that we imagine the whole world can hear and which we call conscience, will tell us whether we are doing right or wrong, if we will but listen to it," says Irene Gay. Mrs. Gay has not yet learned that "conscience" takes its inclination from education. Common sense is the best guide, if it has been properly disciplined.

Take your choice! There are now six papers published at a dollar a year; but remember please, that The Progressive Thinker has at least fourteen long columns more reading matter than the best, furnishing by far the greatest variety of reading matter; in fact the Progressive Thinker is the largest Spiritualist paper published on this earth to-day.

"The true functions of religion may certainly include all attempts to demonstrate the immortality of man and the power of spirit over matter, though the supreme function of a religious congregation must ever be to ennoble the life that now is, and elevate the tone of society in the midst of which it is situated," says Mr. Colville.

"As a religion, or the religion, Spiritualism stands or falls on its own merits, not through the imperialism of an organization that can make it popular as Rome popularized the Nicean creed, at the cost of thousands of lives," says Mr. Grumbine. Mr. Grumbine evidently intends to work outside of the National organization, and do his own thinking exclusively.

"If you had not climbed to the mountain's top, you can not expatiate upon the grandeur of the scene from such a height," says Augusta Frances Tripp. If Mr. Grumbine had been made President of the National Association, at $1,200 per year, perhaps from that mountain's top of observation, the scenery of organization would have been grand and beautiful, and everything altogether lovely. The "mountain top" always has an exhilarating effect.

Swami Vivekananda, the learned Hindoo, says: "The essential idea is that we are all one, human beings and animals; every particle of matter, every atom, is like a point at one end of the radii; and as you go along all those radii converge and meet at one center, the heart, the soul of this universe, the soul of this world, the soul of our souls, the soul of your soul and my soul. Just as the body finds its unity—the body is a changing mass containing different parts which are constantly changing; yet there is something behind it where there is unity, and that is the soul of man."

"It has been proposed to lay still deeper foundations for the work of Spiritualism by establishing a Commission for the purpose of raising and controlling funds to uphold the National organization in its broader and more strictly spiritual plans," says President H. D. Barrett.

W. H. Bach is engaged at Springfield, Mass., until June 1st.

"I do not expect to answer many questions. Millions have been asked, only a few answered. Mystery faces us on every hand. If some one of you will explain to me a grass-blade a finger length high, I will explain for you all the rest of the universe. We face infinite mystery on every hand. And it is fortunate for us we do; for, if we could read the riddle of this universe, we should be reading our death-warrants. There would be nothing else left for us to do. Hope of anything like immortality would be absurd—not only absurd, but a curse—if we knew everything, and nothing more was left for us to investigate." Such are the words of M. J. Savage. What, Brother Savage, about an infinitely wise God. Has his death-warrant been signed in consequence of his unlimited knowledge? If you kill the infinitely wise man in advance, how is the infinitely wise God to continue on indefinitely? How we do wish these great men would reason to some purpose?

"Astronomy is the science of life and death of worlds and souls. Nothing is so beneficent as death understood; the history of the planet's progress shows that death has been, at every single step, the condition of growth and of advancing life. The lower types of organic life must die and disintegrate before we can have the higher stages. Thus, all along, it is life, new life, larger life, grander life, born out of decay and death. Do we not also see how, instead of being a terror and a calamity, it is really the last, highest, best, sweetest, crowning gift of God? There is only a separation, and that for a little while. When the world learns how to obey the natural laws of this, our human life, and knows the fact of continued existence, death will then be recognized as a beneficent spirit, the messenger of the Excellent Creative Power, a friend not feared, but welcomed as opening to us the golden gate of a life of greatness and splendor. We, humble travelers from the celestial worlds to the lands of heaven, look at death as the finest, greatest and noblest kind of birth from the most wise, most just and most loving Eternal Ordainer, and we shall all, when we know how to detach ourselves from certain ways of looking at death, from certain selfish views, be able to see the divineness of it. Birth and life, work and enjoyment, death and resurrection—such is the immanent law in the terrestial life, as well as in the universal and eternal creation; for inferior lives and superior existences form a single unity. Death comes and touches us, and then we realize the we are citizens of heaven," such were the words of Wilfrid Marsan.

C. B. Walker, the clairvoyant and healer, is about to close his busy season of four months, in Keene, N. H., relieving the sick and suffering and giving comforting tests and counsel to the sorrowing, puzzling the skeptic and giving light to the investigator. He will go early to Lake Pleasant Camp for the season.

A HIGHER PHASE OF SPIRITUALISM has to be presented. Phenomena of all descriptions are needed of a more decisive character, and the days for destructive criticism are nearly passed. What Spiritualists and investigators both require is the constructive presentation of the spiritual philosophy, based upon clear, forcible, and definite evidences of spirit identity.

THE NATIONAL FEDERATION

is steadily growing, and every year we register an increased number of affiliated societies and associated members; thus a bond of union—of power for cooperative effort—is quietly being formed which is consolidating the movement, and will ere long secure for us recognition in a variety of ways—for nothing succeeds like success. The Annual Conference at Liverpool showed that the Societies are in earnest, and are determined to grapple with the "burning questions" within the movement, as well as carry out a "forward" and aggressive policy in propaganda work.

THE TWO WORLDS.

We feel sure that readers will be pleased to know that "our paper" has steadily increased in circulation, and that our last issue touched the highest figures yet attained. We know we have to thank very many friends for personal efforts, and we are happy in the knowledge that very warm feelings of comradeship and regard exist between the ever-increasing army of supporters of the Two Worlds and ourselves, which cordial relations we shall strive to always deserve and preserve.

GOOD WILL AND BROTHERHOOD.

There is at the present time, so far as we can sense the psychic conditions of the movement, more of goodwill and brotherhood; more of hope and promise for harmony and progress than we ever experienced before, and although we do not anticipate anything sensational in 1897, we do expect that it will be a year of marked development—a steady advance towards the upbuilding of the great Spiritual Religion of the future.

AN INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE of Spiritualists is to be arranged in London early in 1898—we hope and trust by the joint action of the L. S. A. and S. N. F.—and the question of what is to be done in the North must soon be faced. If we are to have a big bazaar and a grand mass meeting in the Free Trade Hall in 1898, we shall need to have the hall secured in good time, and the Federation and the local bodies cooperating in a harmonious and practical manner to draft their plans and prepare for the great undertaking, so that it may be worthy the traditions of the great hall, the Cause of Immortality and progress, and the noteworthy occasion—the Jubilee of the most wonderful revolutionary religious and social reform that has ever been effected without shedding of blood.

A BEAUTIFUL RADIANT GLOBE.

At a sitting which was being held one evening at the invitation of a mother who had just lost a dearly loved son, amongst other phenomena a remarkable light was seen. It was in the form of a beautiful radiant globe, the center of which was a bright blue of great brilliancy. It was apparently an immeasurable distance away, the wall of the room offering no obstruction to those who watched it, and it remained for about half an hour, when it gradually faded from their sight.

DEEP REVERENCE.

All present were filled with a sense of deep reverence and veneration. The control explained that this was indeed the Light of Christ, who, in verification of the belief which is now very generally held by Christians of every denomination, is gradually approaching this earth; and in fulfillment of His words spoken nearly two thousand years ago is coming to establish His kingdom, the reign of universal love and brotherhood, amongst us.

HOSTS OF ANGELS.

The control further said: "Write thus to the Editor of 'Light.' Tell him that Light is coming to all men. It grows brighter day by day. This light is the Light that should lighten all men that come into the world. Love is embodied in it. Truth is bringing it. Wisdom teaches it. Faith reveals it. Hope nourishes it. Justice craves for it. Glory attends it. Peace claims it. Power waits for it. This remarkable Light is attended by hosts of angels; by dwellers in the spheres of the Blest; by mighty conquerors; by those whose sins, being scarlet, now shine radiant in this Light. Perfected good, perfected man, perfected light.

BEAUTIFUL ANGELS.

Beautiful angels surrounded the medium. The Light appeared behind her; but she was pleased to know that the greatest glory shone when she spoke of Christ's power. Although not herself viewing the greatest glory of the Light she saw it, far, far away, having a starlike radiance.

SHAKESPEARE'S KNOWLEDGE of and belief in Spiritualism are sufficiently attested by the fact that he has introduced the so-called supernatural element into two of the greatest of his tragedies, two of his historical plays and three of his comedies; but, on rereading Victor Hugo's William Shakespeare (writes a contributor), I came across the following passage which had previously escaped my attention. It will be found at page 50 of the edition of 1864:

MAGICAL PRACTICES.

"Forbes, in the pamphlet consulted by Warburton, and lost by Garrick, affirms that Shakespeare was addicted to magical practices; that magic was in his family, and that what little good there was in his pieces was dictated to him by an "Alleur" or spirit." That the poet was impressed, inspired, or controlled, is a conclusion that almost every thoughtful Spiritualist must long since have arrived at. Such superhuman genius could have had only a superhuman origin. But this is the first time we have met with any direct reference in print to Shakespeare's magical faculties, which may be interpreted to mean his gift of mediumship.

DEALINGS WITH MAGIC.

If Forbes was in possession of any trustworthy information with respect to the dramatist's dealings with magic, that information would be invaluable, taken in connection with the knowledge we now possess in relation to spiritual control, and psychic phenomena generally. Not only so, but it would light up the fifth act of The Tempest with more weird meaning.

THIS DRAMATIC POEM.

Thomas Campbell, when speaking of this dramatic poem, which is spiritual from beginning to end, remarks: "Shakespeare, as if conscious that it would be his last work, and as if inspired to typify himself, has made its hero a natural, a dignified and benevolent magician, who could conjure up spirits from the vasty deep and command supernatural agency by the most seemingly material and simple means." Now this is precisely what an exceptionally gifted and powerful medium would be able to accomplish; although as everybody knows, there is no "supernatural agency" involved. And if the dramatist was conscious of the spiritual forces which stood behind him, and inspired him, how significant became the words which he put into Prospero's mouth, at the very time he (Shakespeare) was preparing to lay aside his pen forever, on the completion of The Tempest:

HAVE WAKED THEIR SLEEPER.

Graves at my command
Have waked their sleepers, op'd, and let 'em forth
By my so potent art. But this rough magic
I here abjure; and when I have required
Some heavenly music (which e'en now I do)
To work mine end upon their senses, that
This airy charm is for, I'll break my staff,
Bury it certain fathoms in the earth,
And, deeper than did ever plummet sound,
I'll drown my book.

INVISIBLE WORLD.

As Victor Hugo writes, in his commentary upon this exquisite play, "Shapespeare did not question the existence of the invisible world; he rehabbilitated it. He did not deny man's supernatural power; he consecrated it." But, then, Victor Hugo was one of those "supremely ignorant" men called Spiritualists, at whom the Fidgets et hoc genus omne lift up their long-eared heads and—bray!

THOUGHT-AWAKENERS.

Man's prejudice can never be overcome. He must be left with it. That is, if it does not destroy him.

Where reform begins in self-denial of vices, it is safe to believe that one person at least will be reformed.

I judge no one. I care not what a man did. It is what a man or men are doing that concerns me. Judge not, for in judging ye but judge yourself.

When we live within ourselves, we live for the world, hence we exact nothing from the world; therefore we cannot be disappointed.

In harmony one man changes the destinies for good of the people of all nations of the earth forever, inharmony will destroy a man, a family, or a nation.

He who has not the power to seek wisdom, will never have it thrust upon him.

The Truth is the root of all religions, and 'isms' are the branches distorted by human passions.

The 'pearls' I pick up with great care are not recognized by the vain multitude, who would trample them in the mire.

Every person who lives a 'true life' expects nothing from the outside world, therefore cannot be disappointed no matter what happens.

Mothers in the past have emulated each other to see which could bring up their children in the greatest ignorance of that which they should know, especially their daughters.

Where there is no restraint there can be no excess.

The man in society who most successfully deceives his fellows, though a devil in immorality and dishonesty, is the most popular. Deception in materialism is a great virtue.

From The Spiritual Review, London, Eng.

CAMILLE FLAMMARION,

the French astronomer, is still busy in studying the planet Mars. It is not improbable that the conlusion he has arrived at, in stating that the inhabitants of Mars are winged beings, may yet be proved to be scientifically accurate. Should it be so, the Spiritualistic notion of "winged messengers" (angels) being a childish fancy of the early Christians may be no longer entertained. We must be ever on the look-out for progressive thought, but we must be careful that, in treading the path of higher knowledge, we do not kick aside in our ignorance and blindness those very facts that may add still greater weight to the important spiritual discoveries of modern times, and which have been the basis of belief of some of the greatest thinkers of the world.

WINGED BEINGS.

It is rather curious, but Nero, in the second book of his spiritual experiences, gives a description of nearly every planet in the Solar system and its respective inhabitants. He mentions Uranus as being inhabited by winged beings of a decidedly high order; while Jupiter, he declares, contains almost every conceivable shape of human life the imagination of man can suggest; and while many of the races live in the lowest stages of barbarism, yet others can boast of the highest state of civilization. We may add that many of the revelations of Nero are based upon actual experience.

CLASSICAL HISTORY.

Nothing is more fascinating to us than the study of classical history. The ancient Greeks and Romans were not the heathenish idolators that they have been regarded as, by numerous theological sects. Their "gods" and "goddesses" were personifications of their intellectual and emotional faculties, and served a most useful purpose in illustrating to the people the qualities of virtue and vice. Mrs. Britten has clearly shown that magical arts existed amongst the ancients, and were practised by them under various forms of religious ceremonies and rites.

THE CHURCH OF ROME

is beginning to recognize the value of the Spiritual philosophy. Various Catholic periodicals have been, in a sort of way, throwing open their columns to the Light of the Coming Faith. We bear no ill-will to the Church of Rome. The forms and symbols of her faith, though laughed at by those who are grossly ignorant, have indeed a great Spiritual significance; and though to a certain extent she has lost the "Spirit" and lives now more by the "letter," yet if she will turn her eyes once more to the glories of the New Dispensation and be willing to join us in sharing its wondrous light, and establishing it firmly throughout the world, her dying hopes may be revived, and her temples filled once more with worshippers of an immortal faith.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

This department is under the management of the distinguished author, speaker and medium,

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

A. U. Collins: Q. Can a deformed brain produce good thoughts? If it cannot, who is responsible? We have pity for bodily deformity, had we not ought to have more charity for those having deformed brains?

A. The activity of the spirit is limited by the formation of the brain, and hence, in the common acceptance of the term, it is not responsible. A man may have the conformation of the brain of a tiger, and his character will be that of the tiger. He is, however, as a man, held responsible by society which is compelled to protect itself against him. Another has the brain f a savage, that organ never has developed beyond that stage in its evolution. He remains a savage. He is incapable of reasoning, and is governed by instinctive impulses. The very existence of the higher types of mankind depends on the successful repression of these abortive forms. Over his birth and organization no one has choice or control, hence cannot be held responsible. But here comes in the supreme law: The higher shall control the lower; that the moral sense of society, expressed in laws, however faultily, must give protection to those who are in advance, against the lingering savages. These laws are based on expediency, and confer the greatest good on the greatest number.

Yet, acknowledging the necessity of this protection, we confess that we ought not to assume credit for superior birth or endowments. We had no choice between affluence and beggars' rags; between superior mentality and savagery. Hence we with humility must grant that had we been born in a different station we should be different, even a savage or a criminal.

We cannot truthfully say that the lowest can do better, but we may place ourselves in such relations with them as to become a new circumstance in their lives and turn them to righteousness.

S. B., Cleveland, O.: Q. (1) What are the motions of the earth?

(2) If a man could raise himself above the earth's atmosphere and remain for six hours, and then descend, would he strike the earth, or would he be in space?

A. The earth is in round numbers, 92,000,000 miles from the sun, and the circumference of its orbit is 550,000,000 miles. As it passes around this vast circle once in 365 days or one year, it must travel 18 miles in a second, 64,000 miles an hour, and 1,500,000 a day. At the same time it turns on its axis once each day, so that every part of its equatorial surface must revolve from west to east at nearly 1,000 miles an hour. Its spheroidal form, assumed when still a plastic vapor, prevents any change in the axis of its rotation.

If a person could be lifted from the earth's surface, and wholly freed from its diurnal motion, and at the end of six hours "dropped," there would be no earth there to fall to, for in six hours it would have gone nearly 400,000 miles along its orbit, and in common with the solar system, moved in another vaster circle around some unknown center, at probably a far greater velocity.

This suspended individual would witness a rare spectacle. For the earth at first extending to the horizon, would contract into a vast moon, growing less and less as it rushed away. At the end of the third hour it would appear thirteen times larger than the full moon; at the end of six hours no larger, and in less than a day would shrink into a star and disappear.

If this observer could be carried forward by gravity, yet be free from the earth's rotation on its axis, he would see the surface of the earth rushing from west to east at the velocity of 1,000 miles an hour, or about 17 miles a minute—a speed that would render all objects invisible, and if he was dropped after six hours, he would find himself 6,000 miles west of the point from which he ascended.

A. D. T., Chicago: Q. (1) What rational proof have we that the spirit of man survives the death of the body and is immortal? And by whom was the idea invented?

(2) What rational proof have we of the doctrine of reincarnation? And who invented the idea?

A. (1) The idea of immortality is of remote antiquity. The cave-man of Europe left food, the spear and arrow at the grave for the use of the spirit. That the spirit of man survives the death of the physical body, is proven by all the facts of Spiritualism.

(2) There is not the least evidence in favor of the doctrine of reincarnation, but there is overwhelming evidence against it. It was introduced in remote antiquity.

O. W. Barnard: Q. (1) Is Christian science reliable in curing disease?

(2) Is that belief founded wholly on the Bible or not, and if so what justification is there for it?

A. Christian science is a misnomer, because it is not Christian in the common meaning of the word, and in no sense a science. There is a large class of diseases dependent on the mind, usually known as nervous, which may be reached by Christian science treatment, which in reality is only suggestive mesmerism, or hypnotism. The mind has a great influence over the physical condition of the body, and many ailments may be cured by calling away the attention, or strengthening the will. Cases of organic lesion or change, however, are quite beyond its control. Christian science would be helpless before an attack of the microbes of typhoid fever, or diphtheria as it would be in warding off the attack of a tiger.

The only support it has in the Bible is in the miraculous cures of the sick said to have been made by Christ. And yet healing of the sick is only an accidental means of testing the devotee's belief. It makes the proud claim of being the science of spirit, and as spirit is causation, it is the science of sciences—a complete system of religion and morality. It starts with the declaration that all things are a part of God, and as God is good, and cannot be otherwise than well, no part of him can be evil, or sick. Hence there is no evil, no sickness. All is good. It is flattering to vanity to be a part of God, and ought to lead a superior life.

F. H. Rudd, Oregon: Q. In a communication made some time ago, it seems that a lady went to a medium hoping to get a word from her friends, but because she had unearthed a criminal murderer steps in and uses such vulgar language that she refuses to hear him, and whatever medium she visits she receives the same. Why are such things allowed?

A. A cardinal principle of Spiritualism is that the spirit remains the same after the death of the body as before, until changed by the processes of growth in morals and intellect. By potent, yet not well understood laws of repulsion and attraction, those not in accord are restrained from interfering with each other, far more strongly than in this life. There are exceptions, some avenues being opened whereby the annoyance may approach. In this case, if the murderer came it would be expected that he would retain his hatred, and the disposition with which the lady met him was the open gateway for his approach. He was a spirit in prison, and she should have hailed with gladness the opportunity it afforded her to extend the hand of loving charity, and redeem him to the light. Instead, she attempted to thrust him away, and the lower nature excited in her was the means of still stronger attraction so that whoever she consulted as a medium, she brought the same atmosphere and received the same result.

B. F. K., Sterling, Ill.: Q. Where can I obtain the works of Epictetus and Antoninus?

A. They may be obtained through the office of The Progressive Thinker.

Neurist: Q. Why must some mediums continue in perfect health, with vigorous nerves, for continuous manifestations, when others acquire powers on beds of sickness when the nervous system is prostrated?

A. This question is presumed to refer to preceding answers wherein it is held that mediumship in its best form depends on a healthful organization. It is not, however, maintained that such must be the condition for sensitiveness in its broad sense. On the contrary persons who are almost devoid of this faculty, become highly sensitive by sickness, and in others sleep brings on the essential conditions of sensitiveness not at all experienced during wakefulness. D. D. Home—perhaps the most marvelous medium that ever lived—was a great sufferer, and every lengthy series of sittings he gave almost brought him to the borders of death; yet it is to be remarked that with every improvement of his health the manifestations were more astounding.

Nettie Maynard, for some years, lay on her couch unable to move hand or limb, for they were drawn and distorted, and she suffered continuous pain, yet all that time she gave wonderful communications. During the last year I listened to a message from Lincoln through her lips, which if ever an inspired word was uttered, those words were from the source they claimed.

How shall we account for this wonderful ability to be controlled by one who constantly suffered as though drawn on a rack of torture? Her brain was fire. Her countenance bore no trace of the years of pain. It was simply angelic in its sweetness. Her spirit was free, joyous, and already seemed apart from her body. It was spirit talking to and through spirit.

We know that at death full sensitiveness is gained; that is the faculties of a spiritual being are gained, and sensitiveness is one of these. The dying when they lose the physical senses, gain clairvoyance, or the use of their spiritual senses.

Yet we return to the primary proposition that it is best to cultivate sensitiveness with health, that its receptivity is more trustworthy, than when occurring as attendant on weakened conditions of the physical body.

Student, Cambridge, O.: Q. (1) What college do you recommend, good and cheap?

(2) I am told that I am an intuitional medium? Would that be of advantage in my studies?

A. (1) The Ohio State University is one of the cheapest and best.

(2) Intuition is a most valuable assistant, in fact to those who pursue original investigations it is priceless. It has made more discoveries, pushed further into the unknown, than experimentation and reason combined.

All great discoveries have been made by its inspiration. Thought and study by the concentration of mind they cultivate furnish also the conditions most favorable to intuition, or sensitiveness to impressions from higher intelligences. The scholar attracts the scholar from the other side, and the more intense his thoughts the stronger this attraction and the better instrument he becomes for the reception of impressions.

LYNN (MASS.) SPIRITUAL ASSOCIATION.

To the Editor:—The Lynn (Mass.) Spiritual Association, Mr. J. M. Kelty, president, is meeting with grand success in conducting its series of meetings this winter. During the month of February we were favored with the services of that able advocate and Bible Scholar, Rev. Moses Hull—oftenassisted by Mrs. Hull—who called out some of our best people and also some severe critics, who, it is needless to say, were set to thinking as they have never done before, at his interpretation of the Bible, wherein mediumship in all its phases as occurring to-day, was most clearly and indisputably shown to exist, and as a result many converts will be added to our numbers. He was followed by Mrs. Nellie Burbeck, and Mrs. Effie Webster—both good platform test mediums, and to-day by Mr. J. D. Stiles, who with his fluent delivery in logical discourse, poems and wonderful array of names and descriptions of spirits, even to minute detail in many instances have all attracted large and interested audiences.

On next Sunday, March 28th, we celebrate the 49th anniversary with an extensive program of speakers, mediums, reciters of selected and original poems, vocal and instrumental music, etc. An elaborate dinner will be served in our banquet hall, and a good time generally is anticipated.

Your correspondent is making many additions to his already large list of regular subscribers to the Thinker, all of whom speak in warm words of praise for its able management and of its large list of able contributors. Long may they all remain to shed the light of the glorious gospel of Spiritualism to the world, which so much needs the truths they—and you, Mr. Editor—are so grandly promulgating. G. W. F.

LYCEUM LESSONS

As Presented by Hudson Tuttle.

GOLDEN THOUGHT.

Death is not change of being; it is change of sphere.

SUBJECT—DEATH.

For the older groups: Death by the Greeks was not regarded with terror. They went to the funeral rites with crowns of flowers. It was the doctrine of eternal punishment, of hell and the Devil, introduced by Christianity, that gave rise to the horrible ideas of death which are now entertained.

Death is the gateway to a higher existence. The physical body being no longer useful to the spirit, is thrown aside.

We cannot expect the resurrection of the body. That belief came from Egypt, where the body was preserved as a mummy, with the expectation that after a thousand years the spirit would return and enter it. Its elements are scattered, and used over and over in countless bodies.

The resurrection of Christ proves nothing, for if he was a God incarnate, a God-man, he was unlike other men, and St. Paul says: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God."

There is a spiritual body, and a physical. During life these are almost inextricably blended. Death is their separation—the cutting asunder of the silver cord which unites them.

The spirit, whether in the body or out of it, is the same; as the man who goes out of the door of his house is the same that he was within.

We should not mourn for the dead, for the next life is a continuance of this. They have entered it before us, but they are fully conscious of us, and overshadow us by their presence. They will be the first to welcome us.

For the younger groups: (Each leader may fill out this outline, enlarging, and drawing out the views of members.)

The caterpillar feeds all the summer day on the foliage, when autumn comes buries itself under the dead leaves, winds a silken shroud about itself, and remains as dead in its grave. When spring comes, within it has grown a beautiful butterfly, which breaks through the shroud, and spreading its golden wings, floats away a spirit of the air.

So the spirit at death withdraws from the body which is placed in the grave.

If we sought the caterpillar at its burial place we should find only an empty shell. As a butterfly it would be away sipping nectar from the flowers. If we go to the grave of a friend, we find only a worn garment, and that soon dissolves away; the spirit, the real friend we loved, has gone out of it, and perhaps is by our side, or else is with the angels in some fair realm. As they see all our actions and thoughts, how truthful and good should we be to merit their loving care.

MEMORY GEMS.

The perfect fruit of the great tree of life is man, and the perfection of man is in his immortal spirit.

Man as a being of infinite growth, must have infinite time in which to expand, and this is bestowed by death.

As flesh-clad spirits, we walk the courts of immortality as much now as we shall in the infinite future.

We, as spirits, are now in the spirit-world, and to pass rejoicing from this sphere we must leave nothing to regret not having done.

Not alone passes the spirit to its new home: those it has loved, gone before, are there to welcome it.

The spirit loses nothing, gains nothing; it is the same individual, with its faculties the same, before whom extends a vista of infinite possibilities.

Respect for the dead! Not paid with crape, sighs and tears, but a well-ordered life.

Whether as a spirit clad in flesh, or as a spirit in the angel spheres, man is amenable to law.

We are not ephemeral of a day but companions of suns and worlds, and when these have passed away we shall have but begun our never-ending course.

Immortality is the highest achievment of creative energy.

We live that we may die, and we die that we may gain life eternal.

Let us not call back the dying with our grief; rather unite with the angels in their glad welcome.

The spirit-world is our home; and we are all going home.

We must not say that there is rest or sleep in the grave; the spirit awakes to activity.

GOLDEN CHAIN RECITATION.

Conductor—Where are the dead?

Leader—They have been resurrected into the realms of immortal light and life.

Con.—Have they transported their bodies there?

L.—They have bodies, for they have organic form, but their physical bodies were left in the grave to return to the elements and nourish other forms of life.

Con.—Death, then, is but transition to a higher plane;

L.—The passage from one room to another; the casting off of a worn garment.

Con.—And the mind with its attainments, its affections, its desires,

L.—Remains unchanged.

Con.—Shall we mourn our dead?

L.—Aye, we will mourn, for it is human to weep; and while they gain, it is our loss. They cannot be to us as they were, and we have not reached, the heights of their new life.

Con.—Yet we should not cast over them the clouds of our unrestrained grief;

L.—Nor ask them to return to the shadows from which they have passed.

Con.—Death itself is not painful;

L.—No, for its beginning is the freeing of the spiritual faculties, which come with the insensibility of the body.

Con.—And when these gain full activity;

L.—The great change has been, and the spirit is free.

Con.—These spirit friends are ever near us, loving, sympathizing, helping;

L.—And hence we should live in full recognition of their benign presence.

Con.—They cannot become to us as of old,

L.—But we shall go to them and the least we can do to show our respect and gratitude is to so conduct our lives

All—That with unsoiled garments we may gather without reproach in the loving bands to which they will welcome us.

TINCTURED VIEWS

ON THE SUBJECT OF PLATFORM TESTS AND LECTURES.

To the Editor:—In common with the forty thousand readers of The Progressive Thinker, I have been an interested reader of the various opinions expressed by your correspondents in late issues of the paper concerning the advisability of supplementing the lectures by tests from the platform.

My position has always been that without the phenomena it would be impossible to interest the masses in Spiritualism, and I still believe that the demonstrations should go hand in hand with the philosophy.

The philosophy without the demonstrations of mediumship would be much like the play of Hamlet with that character eliminated from the play.

Nearly every person who is a pronounced Spiritualist has been made such by the phenomenal manifestations, and they will remain necessary for the benefit of all investigators as proof of the continuity of life.

We cannot have too much in the line of demonstration, if of the right character. Leaving out all that is spurious and of doubtful character, there is still left much that is helpful to weary, struggling mortals who are reaching out for tidings of their loved ones who have crossed the river of death.

With many others, I do most earnestly protest against much that is given and that passes with the multitude as genuine.

I am not of the opinion that our speakers generally are making a concerted effort to rule the phenomenal mediums from the platform, as expressed by one of your late correspondents; at least that is not my own position, but I do desire to have tests that bear the genuine stamp instead of the hodge-podge jumble of guesswork and questions too often directed to the recipient calling out something in their experience and then claiming it as a test.

Let us have tests by all means, and the more the better, but let us have them straight from the shoulder, without circumlocution or the dragging process so often resorted to, and we shall hear less complaint, and the objections raised will largely disappear.

There should be no ill-feeling generated between the teachers of the philosophy and the demonstrators of the phenomena, nor will there be when viewed from an honest and sensible standpoint.

I wish also to enter my earnest protest against introducing in our meetings the old and stale forms and ceremonies of the church, with its ordinations, installations, invocations and the ordinance of baptism.

This is usually done to cater to the ignorance and prejudice of church people, and from my standpoint is no part of Spiritualism.

If societies must have pastors, and prefer the name of church, let them have it, but in the name of truth and common honesty let us cease teaching a mixture of Christianity and a diluted spiritual philosophy with the hope of catching suckers and gudgeons.

If the philosophy of Spiritualism is true, it relegates to eternal oblivion the heavens and hells of Christian superstition with their attending gods, devils and atoning saviors, and introduces us to a rational philosophy and natural religion, and which is founded upon the eternal verities of nature and which needs no distributing of orthodox platitudes for its maintenance. We have nothing in common with the decaying dogmas of the church nor can we make progress by catering to the prejudice and ignorance of its adherents, as witnessed by the periodical efforts made to crush out all free thought and all persons who refuse to pronounce its shibboleth, the annual effort in our State legislatures to squelch natural healers, and the still later effort of an assinine Chicago alderman to tax mediums. We need no more laws than we already have to punish the mendacious scoundrels, who, in the guise of mediumship, practice arts that would shame his Satanic majesty, and for the purpose of lining their own pockets.

It is high time that we discriminate between people possessing the virtue of common honesty and the shameless frauds who use the livery of Spiritualism for selfish and unholy purposes, and when this is done we shall hear less of suppressing genuine mediums by law.

I wish heartily to commend a late article in The Progressive Thinker by Dr. Conger, as well as a later one by Dr. Juliette Severance, and fully agree with them that there is nothing to be gained by a milk and water policy.

Radical and positive opinions are the demand of the hour, and the promulgation of a Spiritualism in sympathy with the struggling masses and with every reform that has for its object the freeing of humanity from all unjust conditions.

What are we doing to benefit humanity right here and now? should be the earnest question of every person who has a true conception of the demands of Spiritualism, and unless we as Spiritualists can rise to the occasion, doing all that within us lies for the betterment of existing conditions, we shall fail to do our duty and the work will be taken up by other hands.

It is related of certain parties in the earlier days of Spiritualism that they sent application to a bureau which furnished speakers, requesting that a speaker be furnished, but with the particular request that no one be sent who was tinctured with any reform notions, to which was replied, "We can send you a —— fool; all the rest are tinctured."

We have heard much of Spiritualism per se, and of the many objections to all reform topics on the part of its fearful adherents that somebody's feelings might be hurt; but if Spiritualism has come simply to bolster up a fast decaying theology, or to found another sect for humanity to wrangle over, it might as well have remained away and let the numerous sects fight it out if it takes until doomsday.

Yours for a Spiritualism that does something for this world.

SUNLIGHT HAS AGAIN COME.

To the Editor:—Sunlight has again visited our humble home. The Progressive Thinker has again come to hand with its cheer. A short time ago my subscription expired, and I could not renew at once, and you cannot think how lonesome I was. It seems to me as if I had been asleep for several weeks, and just returned to consciousness.

The Progressive Thinker, brimfull of the best thoughts that were ever put into one paper or ever emanated from the fertile brain of men and women, inspired by the bright beings of the spirit realm. The time I first began to read it marks a great event in my life. That was three years ago. It was then that I passed out of bondage and slavish fear, to a full sense of liberty—made free by the light of truth. I believe that The Progressive Thinker has been the means of making more people supremely happy, as far as happiness goes, than any other source on earth.

A person, as a usual thing has to learn to read it. Some friend will come into my house, pick up a copy of the paper, glance at it, read something derogatory to the church or Christianity, throw it down, feeling anger rising; but when that cools they have to acknowledge its truth. After that, on the sly, they read more and more. Then they will fly to their Testaments and read it as they never read it before. They will read the paper awhile, then the Bible. Soon they will speak slightingly of it (the Bible), as if to question its truth.

Ah! brother, it is so hard to break away from early teachings. They have been taught to believe that "Jesus Christ was the only begotten son of God," without question, and "no man cometh to the Father (God) except by him." Brought up in Sunday-School, and having listened to some good man tell of the unsearchable riches of Christ, how loving, kind and gentle he is, etc., and singing: "Ashamed of Jesus—that dear friend, on whom my hopes of heaven depend," and then to have it pointed out that they are depending on things that have no foundation of truth! Their idols must be shattered, torn down and destroyed, before they can accept the spiritual philosophy and phenomena of modern Spiritualism. There are some who try to hang onto both. They make me think of a hen that has hatched out two or three chickens and they get out of the nest, and she tries to go with the chicks and set on the eggs at the same time. How a person can investigate the broad, liberal views of Spiritualism, and at the same time try to stay in the old rut of superstition, is a curiosity to me. Long live and prosper The Progressive Thinker and its noble editor. Z. F. VALLIER.

ALL HAIL—A PENTAMETER.

All hail! the good and grand in every age,
The Athens scholar and the Eastern sage,
The noble Trojans who the world surprised,
The Zoroaster, Buddha or the Christ.
All hail! the good and true of every clan,
The trusting woman and the manly man,
The ones who counsel peace in time of strife,
The ones who make more bright the paths of life.
All hail! each country's true and loyal sons,
The war-scarred warrior and the martyred ones;
The ones who fight 'gainst destiny's sterner might;
The ones who fall while fighting for the right.
All hail! the thinkers of this living age—
The ones who fear not bigot's foaming rage.
All hail! the Yuletide on its peaceful wings,
While tiny birdling in the Southland sings.
All hail! the ice-king and Borealian storms,
Which crystal globules in its pathway forms.
All hail! the mortals who with glory sing—
See beauty, purpose in each worldly thing.
All hail! the loving men and women too,
Who through life's struggles standing staunch and true
To one another firmly as they go,
While earthly storms and blasts the fiercest blow.

A NOTE-WORTHY WRITER OF FICTION.

The attention of the readers of The Progressive Thinker should be called to Frederick Upham Adams, editor of New Occasions, a radical monthly magazine published in Chicago, and a brilliant writer of works of fiction. Mr. Adams has been for years an earnest student of social phenomena and, at the same time, a writer constantly in practice and always in demand on the daily press. He possesses a brilliant imagination and a keen insight into men and affairs, together with a versatile and polished style. These various characteristics are abundantly illustrated in his latest novel, "President John Smith," written before the last National campaign, but accurately foretelling much of it, although the date of the campaign narrated in the book is set at 1900. Mr. Adams believes and earnestly desires that the issue of the right of the people to rule shall become the paramount question to be fought out in 1900. He takes steps to make it the issue, and, in the opinion of many "President John Smith" may become the "Coin's Financial School," preparatory to that campaign. Mr. Adams is now running through the pages of New Occasions a thrilling new novel, entitled "Spirits of '76," which cannot but be of interest to Spiritualists, in that it deals with the views which the fathers of the Republic are supposed to form upon mundane affairs as the result of a revisit.

THE World's Sixteen Saviors, —OR— CHRISTIANITY BEFORE CHRIST.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

New and startling revelations in religious history which disclose the Oriental origin of all the doctrines, principles precepts and miracles of the Christian New Testament, and furnishing a key for unlocking many of its sacred mysteries, besides comprising the History of Sixteen Oriental Crucified Gods. This wonderful and exhaustive volume will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which the author has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape, the student of free thought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows to the mark. Printed on fine white paper, 380 pages. New edition, revised and corrected, with portrait of author.

Price $1.50. Postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

HERESY, ... OR ... LED TO THE LIGHT.

A Thrilling, Psychological Story of Evangelization and Free Thought. It is to Protestantism what the "Secrets of the Convent" is to Catholicism.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

The distinguished author, Hudson Tuttle, requires no introduction to the readers of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, but the following headings of chapters will show them what they may expect from the book:

CONTENTS:—An Idyl — Fordham — Building the Church—The Evangelist—Blood—The Saloon—The Lost Daughter—Law—The Harvest of Souls—Jane Grey—The Mother of Cain—Evolution—Stella—The Cell—Death—A Step Forward—The Home Circle—The Double Role—Heresy—Annette—The Bank Robbery—Liberty—All Is Well That Ends Well—The New Church—The New Way; Led to the Light.

Every chapter is devoted to one idea, and the whole presents so many tableaux moving onward to the climax. The fiendish career of the revivalist is contrasted with the character of the honest minister and the thinking agnostic. The steps by which a preacher emerges from the church, and the difficulties he meets are graphically presented. The new church and progressive lyceum evolved out of the old, form an interesting study to those seeking new methods.

It is a beautiful volume of 223 pages, and the price in accordance with our new departure, is 50 cents, postpaid, or five copies for $1.25. For sale at the office of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

LIFE IN TWO SPHERES. A Fascinating Work.

The readers of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER will remember the story under the above title, by Hudson Tuttle, which was published in its columns. At the time, constant inquiries were made as to its appearing in book form. This wish has now been gratified. It makes a volume of 248 pages, in style and form like the "Convent of the Sacred Heart," with a finely-engraved likeness of the author on the cover. The scenes of the story alternately shift from earth to the spirit spheres, and the philosophy of Spiritualism, the occupation and modes of life of spiritual beings, are presented in the pleasing form of narrative.

The following are the chapter-titles: Introduction; The House of the Sage; Home of the Miser; The Low Societies; Hades; Christmastide in the Spheres of Light; Christmastide and the Golden Gate; The Unhappy Marriage; Easter Day in Heaven; A Visit to the Earth; The Change Called Death; Coming to the Knowledge of the Light; The Society Again Visits Earth; The Forsaken and Despised; Discussion; A Visit to a Distant Globe; Reunion in the Spirit-world; Contentedness Not Goodness; Address of the Sage.

It is a book the Spiritualist will be delighted with; a book in which the investigator will find answers to ever-recurring questions; a book which will interest the church member, nor repel the most prejudiced. The price in paper is 50 cents; muslin $1; postpaid.

ENCYCLOPEDIA ... OF ... BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM ... OR ... A CONCORDANCE

To the principal passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism;

Together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible.

BY MOSES HULL.

Much that is in this book appeared in an abridged form in a series of nine full pages of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. These articles were prepared at the call of hundreds of Spiritualists who felt the need of some kind of document for ready reference. They only seemed to whet the appetite for more; hence the publication of this work.

The author, Moses Hull, has written many volumes on Spiritualistic and other themes and each one is full of careful study on the subject chosen. Mr. Hull, in his introduction of this work says:

"Hoping that this book will serve to lead the people out of the wilderness of doubt and despair; and that when Spiritualism shall have wrested the Bible from its 'sanctified' enemies, it will not 'spike' it, but will use it to batter down the walls of Christian superstition and ignorance, I send it out on its errand of enlightenment with the humble prayer that it will prove a divine benediction to every reader."

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM contains 385 pages, beautifully printed on good paper, contains a full-page portrait of the author and is handsomely bound in cloth. Every Spiritualist should have this work.

THE COMING AMERICAN CIVIL WAR.

BY BURTON AMES HUNTINGTON.

This excellent book is written in the interest of humanity, of liberty, and of patriotism—a book written for the purpose of calling attention to the deadly dangers that beset us on every side, and more especially to the hostile attitude and the insidious wiles of an ever-present, though secret, unscrupulous foe—the Catholics. Washington's words of warning, Lincoln's apprehension and the prophecy of General Grant are all included in the volume. Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, in a recent sermon said: "The church tolerates heretics where she is obliged to do so, but she hates them with a deadly hatred, and uses all her power to annihilate them. Our enemies know how she treated heretics in the Middle Ages, and how she treats them today where she has the power. We no more think of denying these historic facts than we do of blaming the Holy Ghost and the princes of the church for what they have thought fit to do." Every one should read this work. Paper, 300 pages. It will be sent, postpaid, for fifty cents. For sale at this office.

SPIRITUALISM VS. BRAHMINISM.

Poet Replies to Poet, or Is It the Brahmin Spirit Revising His Work Done In the Body?

In The Progressive Thinker of March 13, appeared an excellent article entitled "Death Beautiful," from the pen of J. W. Dennis, which he closes with a Brahmin poem, which seems out of harmony with the rest of the article. Perhaps, Brother Dennis, in admiring its beauty of language and description, failed to catch the true meaning of the line.

This poem illustrates the Brahmin's belief that the soul flies away, is "absorbed in the bosom of Brahm," and returns no more.

I am inspired to answer the verses in the poet's own rhyme and rhythm, and therefore recopy the one quoted by Brother Dennis and subjoin the revision thereof as I receive it, leaving it to the public to judge which best accords with Nature's laws, the original or the revised. Perhaps the ancient Brahmin poet, with a desire to correct his former errors, may be my inspirer. As yet I know not a word that I shall write, but am positively impressed that by the time I have copied the original the revision will be given to me.

Following is the Brahmin poem, (Kilatza is a mountain and the Gunga is a river).

The snowflake that glistens at dawn on Kilatza,
Dissolved by the sunbeam descends to the plain;
There mingling with Gunga it flows to the ocean,
And lost in its waters returns not again—
It comes not, it goes not,
It comes not again.
On the rose leaf at dawning a dewdrop is shining,
Which later exhaled falls in nourishing rain,
Then rills back to Gunga, through green fields meanders,
Till onward it flows to the ocean again—
It comes not, it goes not,
It comes not again.
A snowflake still whitens the peak of Kilatza,
But the snowflake of yesterday flows to the main;
At dawn on the rose leaf still glistens a dewdrop,
But the dewdrop of yesterday comes not again—
It comes not, it goes not,
It comes not again.
So the soul that is freed from the bondage of nature
Escapes from illusions of joy and of pain,
And pure as the flame that is lost in the sunbeam,
Ascends unto Brahm and comes not again—
It comes not, it goes not,
It comes not again.

A SPIRITUAL REVISION.

The snowflake that glistens at dawn on the mountain,
Dissolved by the sunbeam descends to the plain;
There joining the river it flows to the ocean
And lost in its waters it floats o'er the main—
It rises, it comes back,
It goes once again.
On the lines of the sunbeam in morning's bright gleaming
That drop from the ocean is lifted again,
And back to the mountain o'er green fields and forests,
It falls on its mountain in snowflake or rain—
It rises, it comes back,
It goes once again.
And so while a snowflake still rests on the mountain,
The snowflake of yesterday floats to the main,
But still it may rise in the clouds of the dawning
And to its companions return once again—
It rises, it comes back,
It goes once again.
So the soul that is freed from the bondage of earth-life
Is borne far away from all sorrow and pain,
And free as the dew that ascends on the sunbeam,
It goes to its rest, but at will comes again—
It rises, it comes back,
It goes once again.

PROGRESSIVE THINKER SCRAP-BOOK—ARE YOU MAKING ONE?

How many of the 40,000 readers of the Thinkers are making or have already made a scrap-book?

I have just completed one of 125 pages 8x12, and presented it to my aunt, Mrs. W. H. Calvert, who is greatly pleased with the present. Occasionally I see that a correspondent writes that he has made one, and so I thought I would tell you about mine.

After completing it, I cut the title of the Thinker off and pasted it on the inside cover page, which reads like this: "The Progressive Thinker" Scrap Book, also "Progress, The Universal Law of Nature; Thought, The Solvent Of Her Problems." Mucilage is the best for this purpose, pasting only about ½ inch on the edge to prevent creasing, (cut out some of the leaves to prevent bulging.) After I would finish clipping the Thinker there wouldn't be very much left as there are so many good articles in it worth preserving.

I intend to commence another soon, as the work is very fascinating as well as valuable. Our scrap-book is also profusely illustrated with portraits of mediums and other pictures. It is too bad to have those grand articles, poems, etc., destroyed, and all subscribers should preserve them in this way. We also lend our Thinkers, and scrap-book too, and thus we may do much good in spreading the truth.

We think that The Progressive Thinker is a grand paper and is in the front ranks of progression. We are deeply interested in "Solon and Mary," and think it is one of the best things you have ever published. We would very much like to know how it is communicated.

Hoping this will be the means of booming the "Thinker Scrap-Book" somewhat, I will now close with best wishes for the success of the Thinker and its able publisher. Yours for truth and humanity. GEO. L. BARRUS.

119 Pond St., Providence, R. I.

She does not know how the Doctor knows about her:

Dr. Watkins:—I received your letter, but owing to sickness in my family, I have been unable to write before. Hope you will pardon me for the delay. I would say in answer to your letter, I think you fully understand my case, as you described my feelings better than I could myself. I don't see how you knew about me, but it seems you do, in some way. Yours truly,
JENNIE M. WORCESTER.
84 Pecker St., Haverhill, Mass.

Wonders hows the Doctor knew the baby was to be a girl:

Dear Dr. Watkins:—Your letter came in due season, but I am very happy to be able to say I did not have to follow its directions in order to get back my strength. Have been gaining very fast, especially in the last week. My daughter is recovering very fast, so of course we are all happy. I wonder who told you that a girl was wanted here much more than a boy. Whoever did, gave the information correctly. That you should know it, caused us to smile more than once. Thanks will not half express my gratitude for returning health. But I do wish you and yours very many happy new years. Very sincerely,
S. C. LADD.
E. Somerville, Mass., Jan. 3, 1897.

Dr. C. E. Watkins:—I received your letter prescribing for my throat, and I am trying the remedy, and think it will help me. I do not think I will take another month's treatment now, as I am so much better, but if I ever need help again, shall surely send to you. Yours truly, MATTIE A. WILCOX.
Jeffersonville, Vt., Sept. 1, 1896.

Dr. C. E. Watkins—Dear Sir:—I have nothing to say but the same story—still on the gain. I still eat like a pig, and nothing seems to distress me; no pain in my back. I have gone to work again.
Yours in haste,
LORENZO WORTHEN.
Hillsboro Bridge, N. H.

Dr. C. E. Watkins—Dear Sir:—I am feeling so well I won't need any more medicine. I shall miss the strengthening power that has come with this course of treatment; also your kind letters. With many thanks for your kindness, may the good angels strengthen you for the good of others, is the wish of your friend and ex-patient,
MRS. S. P. TARBELL.
West Braintree, Mass.

Dr. C. E. Watkins—Dear Sir—I received medicine for this month's treatment, but do not think I shall need it as my health is so fully restored, that with the help of Nature and right living I shall be able to continue in that condition, so I return it to you unopened, as per agreement in last letter. I thank you for the kind interest you have taken in my case, and shall take pleasure in recommending you to any of my friends who are ailing, as one that can be relied upon. Yours sincerely,
ALLEN LUCAS.

NEW BOOKS.

Book of Portraits of Leading Anti-Vivisectionists and Others Who Have Aided the Anti-Vivisection Cause. Anti-Vivisection Print, Aurora, Ill.

If someone had said a few years ago that a society would have to be organized, and by a strenuous educational campaign, have laws enacted to prevent live animals being bound on the dissecting table before classes of young boys and girls, and cut fibre from fibre for their instruction, it would have been ridiculed as absurd. It would have been replied that the people had become too merciful and sympathetic, and the age of such brutal cruelty had forever passed. Yet just this has come. The old delight of the savage in torture has revived. That reversion to the types of the past has taken place. The Inquisition cannot with thumbscrew and rack tear the limbs of the heretic, in the name of religion, but the dumb and helpless animal can be bound and subjected to tortures to which no human being ever was or could be, in the cause of pseudo-science.

The movement began in the assumption that all study must be by individual research; that nothing should be accepted unless proven by direct investigation. It was not sufficient that one or a hundred animals were subjected to the awful suffering of having their spinal cords dissected, and their brains lacerated in order to demonstrate the functions of its parts; classes in the colleges, and even high schools, must have a living animal brought before them, and these operations performed!

No one knows where this fiendish practice originated, but France appears to be the hotbed for its propagation. It soon became common in colleges, and as fast as professors adequate to the duty were obtained, gained its way into the leading academies and schools. It was like an overwhelming wave of cruelty, and was upheld because it gave vent to the brutality which in restraint lurks beneath the mask of pretended culture.

There were those trained in ways of mercy, who had sought through the societies for humane education to ameliorate the sufferings and abuses of animals. They were shocked by this new cruelty which came under the plausible plea of being in the interests, and for the advancement of science, and at once set themselves at the task of its suppression.

Among those who gave themselves and their fortune to the cause was Mrs. Fairchild-Allen. She saw that the most effective means to educate the people in ways of mercy was the press, and at once launched The Anti-Vivisectionist, a monthly for the discussion of the subject. An organization was effected, the Illinois Anti-Vivisection Society, with branches in various States, and tracts, books and periodical literature widely distributed.

The cause of justice is moving on to triumph. The accursed revival of the Inquisition, applied to animals, has been arrested in its advance into the public schools, and now the Torquemadas of "science" hold their bloody "researches" behind bolted doors.

Mrs. Fairchild-Allen thought the time had arrived to present to the world the portraits and brief biographies of the leaders of this branch of the humane movement, and has made a beautiful book of nearly fifty portraits, executed in the highest style of the new methods of engraving, with brief notices of the life-work of each.

Francis Power Cobbe fittingly leads, and there is a beautiful view of her ancestral home, and her home in Wales. She was the originator of the movement in England, and assisted in starting the Illinois society. Then comes Lord Shaftesbury, president of the Victoria (London) Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. This is followed by a portrait of that grand and devoted man, Henry Bergh. Then that of George T. Angell, president of the American Humane Education Society, who has given his life and fortune to the cause.

On the same page is the speaking face of Emma Rood Tuttle, the originator of the Angell Prize Recitations, which is rapidly being adopted as the most popular and effective means of educating the people out of cruelty.

Space will not allow of a full enumeration. Among the many others are: Mrs. Mary F. Lovell, superintendent of the World's Department of Mercy, of the W. C. T. U.; Sidney H. Beard, Miss Caroline G. Ewen, Mrs. Anna E. McIntire, vice-president for Michigan; Anna Sewall, author of the famous book, "Black Beauty;" Marshall Saunders, author of "Beautiful Joe;" Mrs. Mona Caird, president and founder of the Independent Anti-Vivisection League (London); Mrs. Mary O. Elster, vice-president for Indiana; Dr. Philip G. Peabody and his son Charles; Dr. Elliot De Bellville Preston, author of "Old Beau;" Miss Clair Tuttle, of the Vanguards, the well-known actress, who has won laurels by her charming articles; and lastly, Mrs. Fairchild-Allen and her youthful daughter who is preparing to assist her distinguished mother in her contemplated exhibit and work at the World's Fair at Paris in 1900.

This is a book that will go into the history of the Vanguard in the cause of justice and mercy to the beings that although having the same keen sense of feeling, the same appreciation of comfort and enjoyment, the same nerves for suffering, cannot speak for and defend themselves.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Poverty's Factory, or the Curse, Cause and Cure of Abnormal Wealth. By Stanley L. Krebs, M. A. Boston. Arena Publishing Company. 25 cents.

With many good and correct ideas are intermixed some that are far from just and correct. His "cure" for the "curse" appears to be the "Christian" cure, notwithstanding the patent fact that Christianity as embodied and practiced by the churches, apparently lays not a straw in the way of the limitless hoarding of wealth. The tenet of Socialism that wealth is created by labor, and, therefore, belongs to the laborers who have produced it, he says is positively impregnable, sound and logical. Then, to combat Socialism, he asserts that "Socialists mean muscular or manual labor. They seem to know nothing of mental labor." This statement is incorrect, as everyone properly instructed knows. The author seems to have gotten his knowledge of Socialism from that ceaseless fountain of misinformation on that subject, the general daily press, which systematically misrepresents Socialists and Socialism. He should seek knowledge of Socialism from recognized Socialists, and not from their enemies.

A Dead Man's Thoughts. By Rev. Edgar Foster, M. A. Cantab: Vicar of Lindsey, Ipswich. The Roxburghe Press, Westminster, England. 3s, 6d.

Just why this series of sermons should be called "A Dead Man's Thoughts," may be considered a puzzle. Were we to give our solution of the riddle, we should say the title is well taken, as the sermons are devoted to the customary setting forth of the dead theological doctrines of a dead orthodoxy, wholly outgrown by the living, progressive thought of to-day. If one relishes orthodox doctrines, one will find the volume pleasant reading—and perhaps, in some inscrutable way, profitable.

The Heaven of the Bible. By Ida C. Craddock.

This is a peculiarly interesting little volume. Its tendency is to show to orthodox church people, from the Bible itself, that the world beyond the grave is a much more cheerful and substantial place than they are in the habit of thinking it to be—that it is in fact a really delightful land. The author's deductions from Bible texts are logical, natural and correct, showing the naturalness of the world and life "over there." It is a book that will interest and please Spiritualists and Christians alike, and all may gather spiritual instruction from its pages. It is handsomely bound in cloth. Price, 50 cents.

Truth in Song, for the Lovers of Truth Everywhere. By Clara H. Scott, 1351 Lexington avenue, Chicago, Ill. Boards, 25 cents.

For the use of christian scientists, Christians, etc., this selection of hymns, songs and tunes, seems well adapted; but Spiritualists pure and simple have little use for songs better adapted to orthodox revival meetings than to the purposes of Spiritualist meetings. There is too much iteration and reiteration of orthodox phraseology. If one wishes to teach orthodoxy, it is well enough to use orthodox phrases; but if one does not wish to inculcate orthodox ideas, it were better to drop orthodox phraseology and stick to the pure and clear language that expresses pure spiritual truth without any admixture of orthodox adjuncts. Versified adulation of "God," and "Christ Jesus" does not harmonize with the spirit of Spiritualism, so well as it would with the ways of the Salvation Army.

of all diseases that flesh is heir to, and will give you proof of her powers, by sending requirements as per small advertisement for diagnosis of your case. Here is one of her many cures:

St. Louis, June 21, 1896.

MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.

With affectionate regards, very truly,
REBECCA LEVY.

SEEMING Impossibilities Possible.

It is all in the knowing HOW, or in understanding the law and working with it, instead of against it. Scientific men by study and experiment, have harnessed electricity and compelled it to do their bidding. Others have made a study of the control of mind over matter, and have learned to direct and control a force more potent and subtile than electricity. Perhaps you will find it to your advantage to send us a self-addressed stamped envelope for particulars. Our fees are only $2 per month, and in the course of time this may mean health, success and happiness for you and yours. Others have found it this way. Address Rowland J. Brown, Austin, Cook county, Illinois. 384

INCIDENTS WORTHY OF CAREFUL CONSIDERATION.

HALLUCINATION REMOVED BY HYPNOTISM—FRENCH METHODS OF TREATING INSANE PATIENTS—BY SUGGESTION AN INNOCENT MANIA IS SUBSTITUTED—EXPERIMENTS IN THE UTTERMOST DEPTHS OF CONSCIOUSNESS—HYPNOTISM AND MESMERISM AS CO-ORDINATE FORCES IN SPIRITUALISM.

"The amazed interest which men and women have recently shown in themselves," said Dr. Grace, "is my only apology for continuing the discussion of some of their peculiarities which are appropriately called phenomenal, says the Cincinnati Enquirer. There is no wider field of inquiry than this; none more needful of intelligent and painstaking cultivators; none where investigators may enjoy a higher reward for their work. When Pope declared that the proper study of mankind is man there were thousands who believed, but scarcely a score who understood the remarkable significance of the hint; and it has grown into an apothegm that your nearest neighbor knows you better than you know yourself. As a rule this is true, but it is scarcely credited.

"What man thoroughly understands all the minute details of his own organization? Who is conversant with the psychical economy that governs his thoughts, acts and motives? What are the springs of action which induce one man to do good and another to do evil continually? What are we, where are we, whither are we bound? Upon these lines an infinite number of questions may be asked without eliciting one substantial response, and yet the asking will continue so long as man occupies the earth, with probably an occasional answer that will stimulate additional inquiry.

"If we pick five of the most intelligent men in the community and request them to explain the origin of life, or even the process by which a blade of grass is produced, every one will stumble in the first sentence, and finally leave the problem unsolved, without throwing upon it a ray of light. To this same committee we exhibit two little brown seeds, no larger than a pin's head, apparently exactly alike, and ask why, when planted side by side in the same soil, one will produce a magnificent crimson flower as large as a dinner-plate, and the other a little colorless blossom less than an inch in diameter. Will they answer? No; they cannot.

"We know nothing about causes. Millions of apparently simple problems in nature are far above our solution, for the reason that we apprehend nothing but results. Many years ago, upon Cape Cod, the residents cut down and marketed some magnificent pine forests. The timber was in demand, and brought a remunerative price. It would pay the proprietors of the land to let other pine forests spring up and mature for the value of the timber, and this was the plan of the good people. They proposed, but another power disposed, for when the new growth of trees appeared they were not pine, but oak! How could the acorn develop from the pine cone? Not according to any natural law that we understand, and probably not at all. More likely the seeds of the oak had been buried deep in the sands of centuries till the pines were removed, and then the vivifying force of the sun brought their germinating principles into action before that of the pine could be reawakened. This is only a guess, and may be as far from the truth as any mere supposition, for it is only the result that we are sure of. That is patent to every comprehension, and unprofitably so to the lumbermen of Cape Cod, where pine lumber commands a more profitable market than any other.

"That which we know not makes an interminable list, and that which we think we know may be almost wholly included by it. Many determinations of science—I will keep within bounds when I say several hundred—which were regarded as final a century ago, have since proved absurdly fallacious. Not a few of these misled and negatived the services of the medical profession in cases of unusual moment, as every well-read physician now understands. Twelve years since I was appointed to prepare a thesis upon a subject then agitating the medical world, but to which I had devoted only the most superficial attention. Excuses were of no avail, and therefore I implored the assistance of a well-known expert, living in a distant city. He sent me a mass of facts and deductions and made my task comparatively easy. Circumstances arose which caused the reading of the paper to be dispensed with, and it was laid aside for future use. Three or four years later I was again appointed for the same service, and, thinking myself fully prepared, and subjected it to a close examination. Many of its assertions were startling, and one I knew to be untrue, although when first presented by the expert I thought it a magnificent fact. I mailed it to my former monitor and requested him to criticise it. He did so, and sent me new material for the essay, accompanied by the statement that most of the principles announced in the original document as fully determined had been discovered as radically false; that many deductions had been made from results rather than from causes, and others from hypotheses which incisive experiment had negatived! He cautioned me to make no positive declarations, but rather to state results from apparent causes and leave the final issue to be determined in the future.

RESURRECTED THE OLD DOCUMENT,

"What could be more unsatisfactory? But I had no other course, and it is well that I adopted the advice of the expert, for since that time it has been discovered that many exceptions to what were supposed to be well-established rules apply oftener than the rules themselves in the specialty I treated, and some of its declared principles are found to be far from radical. By no means have all the old nets of error in this direction been filled, and many continue to walk in them toward an extra-hazardous result. We grope in darkness while searching for the light. Why not take advantage of our neigbor's taper when we have none of our own, and thus profit by any glints of truth it may disclose, no matter where?

"I am prompted to indulge in these preliminary remarks as a general reply to some criticisms received through the mail from professional brethren, all of which are doubtless well meant, and under this impression they are received. One condemns hypnotism as an agent of two dangerous possibilities to be generally used. True. Does our friend also reflect that scores of acids and deadly drugs are the agents of possibilities too dangerous to admit of their common employment? Their sale and use are justly regulated by law, and to the same condition must hypnotism be subjected by those in whose care the public welfare is reposed, else there will eventuate incalculable mischief. My theme is the uses, not the abuses, of hypnotism, just as the professor of surgery talks about the uses of the knife, at the same time knowing that its abuses would furnish the more fruitful theme. Discussions that instruct to profitable ends are alone valuable from my standpoint. Let me give a few illustrations of hypnotism in cases where it proved of inestimable value.

"On one occasion I was called to attend a gentleman whose head was severely injured by an accidental fall from a portico. He was delirious and difficult to manage, and the hospital authorities had been unable to learn his name. Next day, after a restful nap, he appeared sensible and I conversed with him. He had no recollection of his fall and wondered why he was not taken to his home. I asked where he lived. He couldn't tell. What was his name? He had forgotten. His business? Really, he could afford no information about himself, and I concluded that lesion of the brain had destroyed his memory. It must be restored as promptly as possible, but the patient was not then in condition for the attempt. He improved physically with great rapidity, giving evidence of a robust constitution, but memory refused to awaken. On the tenth day following the injury I essayed the hypnotic trance and found him a good subject, and three days later I was enabled to put him into a deep trance, and while in that condition he told everything about himself that we desired to ascertain. He was a merchant in a nearby town, on his way to Eastern cities for the purchase of goods, and had stopped over to call upon an old acquaintance whom he had not found when the accident occurred. His family was just beginning to feel alarmed at not hearing from him when I notified them of his accident and condition. Prompt arrival of his wife at his bedside had a good effect, and his memory was finally restored through hypnotism by establishing a connection between his trance and normal states, by a slow and painstaking process, it is true, but no work is too much for the physician who accomplishes his object. By what other known means could this result have been promptly and satisfactorily reached? 'Trepanning would do it,' says the old time doctor. Well, he may take his choice if the patient is willing, but progressive science favors hypnotism, and it will grow in favor more and more till its employment becomes universal.

"It will not only save drugs—an inconsiderable economy—but lives of untold value. We all know with what frightful and inconsiderate haste people are buried in time of great epidemics, many of them yet alive when placed beneath the sod, beyond human aid. Some diseases, like cholera, superinduce the trance state and all fevers are subject to the same phenomenal influence. It is related that about the beginning of the present century the city of Philadelphia was ravaged by yellow fever. A prominent citizen contracted the disease and passed into a condition of

LUCID LETHARGY.

No pulse could be felt, no respiration was visible, no movement of an eyelid, yet every word spoken in the death room was registered in that man's consciousness. He heard himself pronounced dead by the attending physician. They washed from him the death sweat and robed him in a shroud. The touch of the cold water and the clinging embrace of the shroud thrilled him alike with horror. He gave no sign of life, because he could not. He had ceased to be a 'motor' for the time being. There was fortunately some delay, and just as the coffin lid was about to be screwed down a supreme, despairing effort caused a slight movement and the man's condition was recognized. He was restored and lived several years, but his escape was almost miraculous, whereas the employment of hypnotism would have immediately discovered the presence of life and averted the danger of premature burial. It is a danger against which too many guards cannot be devised.

"When a person has been sick for a long time with dangerous symptoms nothing is more deceptive than the hysterical trance into which he or she is likely to fall. Its exact simulation of death is more frequently calamitous than anybody imagines. The power of recognition passes away, all the muscles settle into absolute quiet, the pulse becomes more and more feeble till it can no longer be felt at the wrist, respiration ceases so that even a feather held over the mouth refuses to vibrate, all signs of life fail and the person is pronounced dead. Some of the most eminent physicians have been misled by these indications and will be again. As I have said, they are frequent in sudden epidemics, and then the maddened people stop for no ceremony. The dead must be buried out of sight without delay, and no provision is made for the false death signals hung out by hysterical trance. American visitors have seen in the Wiertz Gallery at Brussels a pair of pictures which produce any but an agreeable sensation. They illustrate the closing scene of a cholera trance more tragically than any words can picture it. The first represents the father conveyed in a rough pine box by two scoundrelly appearing fellows to his burial, despite the frantic outcries and attempted resistance of his wife and children. The second mirrors a later scene. In a dark and noisome vault the coffin lies with others piled high upon it; the occupant, recovered from his trance, has burst open the lid, and, with agonized face peering through the rent, is struggling violently to free himself from the prison house of defunct mortality. These pictures have a history in an incident fully recorded in the catalogue of the gallery, and there can be no question as to its truth. Thousands of similar tragedies might be recorded if all the details of murderous burials were known, but enough have come to public knowledge, it would seem, to impel the erection of stronger guards against their recurrence.

"History and experiment both prove that in the entranced subject most of the mortal powers—generally all—are suspended, and only the mental and immaterial person is left decidedly in evidence. The spirit, the consciousness, is there as full of life as ever, but its power over the human machine has for the time passed away. It is able to resolve, but impotent to act without outside help. It is as competent as ever to judge of what should be done and what omitted, but the spiritual element finds itself in the strange and unwonted condition if knowing without the power of doing. The personage has retired to the remotest recesses of its inner consciousness and knows not how to emerge therefrom. Under these conditions it is easy for a stranger spirit to reanimate and occupy the mortal tenement; perhaps an such as the Master gave 'the twelve' power over and the grace to cast out devils in His name. I may safely state that spirits of this sort are always looking for such an opportunity, and I know that the vagrant demons yield to no other agency so readily as to hypnotism. It seems to exercise the same power over them as did Jesus of Nazareth when He 'cast out many devils, and suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew Him.' Undoubtedly He possessed hypnotic power in a high measure and was a medium with every psychical gift—otherwise He could not have performed the many miraculous deeds which He did. I use the word 'miraculous' in its conventional sense, for even Jesus had no power to perform any act in contravention of natural law.)

"The trance condition is a deeper sleep than natural slumber and plunges its subject into a more helpless state. The helplessness of those who dream of the impossibility of escape from impending danger is real, they know not why. They cannot flee from the wild beast, the all-consuming fire, the impending avalanche, because in sleep their physical powers are almost invariably in abeyance. The exceptions are somnambulic subjects—dreamers who retain the 'motor' faculties and use them freely, often disastrously. These not infrequently act for a purpose—revenge, theft, perhaps murder—and are unable to control themselves against its execution. In this connection there is a thrilling story of a monk in a German abbey. The prior, going to his cell much later than usual, was astonished to see one of the brothers passing along the hall, wild and fierce of visage, a drawn dagger in one hand and a light in the other. The Superior watched the monk as he walked with determined mien to the prior's door and opened it. The prior followed him without noise. The man placed the lamp upon the table, went over to the prior's bed, felt cautiously with one hand, and then with the dagger struck three times so forcibly that the weapon pierced quite through the bed covering and mattress. The light of triumph came into his face, and picking up his candle he walked out of the room and back to his cell..

"Next morning the prior sent for the sleep-walking brother. The monk was evidently embarrassed. He was asked if he had enjoyed a restful night.

"'No,' said he, 'I had an unquiet night.'

"'What was the matter?'

"'I shall have to confess. I dreamed that you had murdered my mother, and that I was impelled by wild fury and revenge to go to your room and stab you to death, and that I succeeded. When I awoke the sweat stood on me with horror at the deed, and on my bended knees I thanked God it was but a dream.'

"Good care was thereafter taken to lock the dreaming brother securely in his cell every evening, for no one could foresee the nature of his sleep-walking impulse on the next occasion. What would have been the nature of his crime had he accomplished his somnambulistic purpose? You think it would not have constituted a criminal act? But where would proof be found to establish that it was not purposive? This is a difficult thing to establish, as was proved in a Court in Scotland a few years ago. In one of his sleep-walking spasms a somnambulist killed his daughter, and was arrested to answer for the deed. It was proved that he had been the victim of somnambulic terrors from early childhood, during which he had done many unaccountable acts, mostly contrary to his nature and general disposition. After his marriage these fits assumed another form. His nights were made miserable by visions of wild beasts attacking his family, in whose defense he made those exertions which natural affection prompted. It was in such somnambulic and unconscious condition—as testified by his wife and son—that he had seized his youngest child to drag her away from a threatening beast, and had hurled her with such force against the opposing wall that she dropped limp and dead.

"The father's grief was irrepressible, but the law must be satisfied. His trial was conducted with all the solemnity that would attend that of the most hardened murderer, but it was almost impossible to awaken the man's interest in it, so heartsore was he at the death of his child. Notwithstanding proof as to high character and the somnambulic impulse, he was found guilty of manslaughter! An appeal to the Crown was promptly made and the best people in the neighborhood busied themselves in the man's behalf. There were many difficulties and impediments to overcome, however, and the poor victim spent more than two years in prison before he was pardoned for the act he did unconsciously and in direct opposition to his nature and inclination!

"How can a crime be committed under these conditions? It cannot. The act is demoniacal, performed by an obsessing spirit while the man or woman seeming to act is morally and physically helpless. It may do to talk about the mighty Ego, and speculate upon individualities of irresistible force and commanding power, but there is nothing weaker or more puny than mortal man in the hands of an influence which always attends him and is ever on the watch to surprise him off guard. This is a subject about which there is much to learn, for about it is definitely known. I doubt if it is as inexplicable as some metaphysicians assert, and especially am I doubtful of that theologian's wisdom who says it is a matter into which we ought not to inquire. What is there relating so intimately to mankind that it is not interesting and profitable to be informed upon? We cannot dispose of the subject by sweeping generalizations nor by sneers. In a commanding way it is said that Spiritualism, Hypnotism and Mesmerism are unworthy of intelligent examination, but it is rarely by persons of the highest or most alert intelligence that such declaration is hazarded. Only through this trinity of isms has much of the phenomenal progress of the nineteenth century in knowledge been effected, especially that knowledge applicable to the relief of human misery.

"Observations of fact will continue to lead to new issues and fresh conclusions. It is a good plan to let theory alone till a good foundation for it is laid in solid fact, and that is what we are looking for. M. Janet, as I have had occasion to remind you, has made a great stride toward this result and his co-workers are keeping even pace with him. They are showing the world many new things, as well as how to do old things, hitherto done awkwardly, much better and with larger effect. They have found a positive cure for many types of insanity, and feel encouraged in the view that they will discover a remedy for all cases of this direst affliction of human kind. We cannot have too many catholicons for the thousand ills that flesh is heir to.

"It is unnecessary to claim anything for hypnotism beyond what it is now actually accomplishing. In the therapeutic field it is proving immensely useful, and the subtler knowledge of subconscious states which we are now gaining will increase the power of healing many fold. How many pathological states—not those which are simply nervous and functional, but organic ones also—may be due to the existence of some perverse buried fragment of consciousness obstinately nourishing its narrow memory or delusion, and thereby inhibiting the normal flow of life, is a problem of awful moment to the race and to unborn generations. Let me illustrate what I mean by the outline of a case far from exceptional.

"It is that of a girl of 19, whom I will designate as Clarise. She visited M. Janet in a condition almost desperate, and implored his help. She had monthly convulsions, crises, chills, fevers, delirium, attacks of terror, lasting for days, together with shifting anesthesias and contractures all the time, and a fixed blindness of the left eye. Divining no particular psychological factor in the case, the physician took little interest in his patient, who remained in the hospital seven months' and had all the usual courses of treatment applied, including water cure and ordinary hypnotic suggestion, without the slightest good effect.

"Despair seized upon the girl, the result of which was that M. Janet threw her into the deeper trance for the purpose of obtaining, if possible, some knowledge of her remoter psychologic antecedents, of which, in the waking state and in ordinary hypnotism she could give no definite account. He succeeded beyond his expectations, for both her early memories and the internal memories of her crises returned in the deep somnambulism, and she explained

THREE VITAL THINGS

"1. Her periodical chill, fever and delirium were due to a foolish immersion of herself in cold water at the age of thirteen; and now, years later, the experience then stamped upon the brain for the first time was repeating itself at regular intervals in the form of an hallucination undergone by the subconscious self, and of which the primary personality only experienced the other results.

"2. The attacks of terror were accounted for by another shocking experience. At the age of sixteen she had seen an old woman killed by falling from a height and the subconscious self, for reasons best known to itself, saw fit to believe itself present at this experience also whenever the others crises came on.

"3. The hysterical blindness of the left eye had the same sort of origin, dating back to her sixth year, when she had been forced, in spite of her cries, to sleep in the same bed with another child, the left half of whose face was disfigured by a foul eruption. The result was an eruption on the same part of her own face, which came back for several years before it disappeared entirely, and left behind it an anesthesia of the skin and the blindness of an eye.

"The thing needed was to get the subconscious personality to leave off having these senseless hallucinations. They had become so stereotyped and habitual that this was no easy task. Simple commands were fruitless, but M. Janet finally hit upon an artifice which shows how many resources the successful mind doctor must possess. He carried the poor Clarise back in imagination to the earlier dates. It proved as easy with her as with many others when entranced to produce the hallucination that she was again a child, by an impressive affirmation to that effect. Then he made her believe that the horrible child with whom she slept had no eruption and was charming, so that she was finally convinced and caressed without fear this new object of her imagination.

"He made her re-enact the cold immersion, but gave it also an entirely different result. He caused her to live again through the old woman's accident, but substituted a comical issue for the old tragedy that had made so deep an impression.

"The subconscious Clarise, passive and docile as usual, adopted these new versions of the old tales, and soon all morbid symptoms ceased as if by magic. M. Janet says: 'Clarise no longer shows the slightest mark of hysteria. She is well and has grown quite stout. Her physical aspect has undergone a decided change for the better, and she is cheerful and happy.' She is no longer hypnotizable, as frequently happens in these cases when health returns.

"We know too little about trances. They are not sufficiently studied. I can relate the case of a subject, not hysterical, who in the trance condition describes people and places which she never saw nor heard of in her normal state. She speaks in tongues of which her normal self is totally ignorant, and resolves problems in calculus which would puzzle a professor of mathematics, while normally she is a blunderer in the most ordinary calculations in figures. This looks like a large statement, and it is. But it is strictly true. T. P.

SOMETHING ABOUT "I."

A STUDY OF MYSELF AND THE CHANGES WITHIN ME.

What is that written in one sweep of the hand, one broad, independent, self-declaring individuality? What so potent, so full of freedom, so prophetic? What lifts the head, straightens the spine, squares the shoulders, invigorates the whole body, like the declaration of "I?" Not egotistically speaking, but with the new consciousness of power born of a higher concept of our Godhood, our immortality, our infinity. What am I—what to-day? Not the I that I was ten years ago, oh, no. To-day I am a new I, a new being without limitations, and why? I am thinking differently—that is why. I is a product of thought, is thought. "As a man thinketh, so is he." I was a weak, suffering woman, had faith, great faith in my weakness—thought it nice to be weak. I could tell of my ailings and draw on people's sympathies, did not know I was robbing them of what did not belong to me or that which hurt rather than helped me. O, what consummate foolishness, what unwisdom!

But that was one of my series of Is. I took up the study of Spiritualism; I found within myself new potencies, I entered new fields, I found new possibilities—endless ones. I had been a statement of weakness, now I was growing strong. I found my strength was good for others—I could help those weaker than myself; I could go into a sick room and the sick would feel better. What kind of an I was I now? If I could help others, need I be sick? If I could help others, the potency was there to help myself. I became that I. I found, too, that I could be a transmitter of the thoughts of others; here was another power—what did it mean? Am I a chameleon, changing colors according to time and place? I saw the faces and forms of the departed, I heard voices talking to me from the air. I could dance though I had never learned a step in my life, I could read character and at times describe the interior of the human body—what was all this? the make-up of a new I? Yes; just that; new Is coming to the front all the time, new powers being unfolded, new light coming, new desires, new thoughts doing their work, reconstructing, reorganizing the individual.

I can look back at the old I as I can look over the old story, and wonder to myself until I feel like the old woman who became so changed that her little dog did not know her. How I can see by watching myself that it is thought that has made the change. I changed the methods of thinking, I opened the door for other intelligences to come in and help me. By the power of their thought, added to mine, wonders have been accomplished. What, then, are we but expressions of thoughts, statements of intellectuality and spirituality on one plane to-day, on another to-morrow?

And I affect others by my thinking: where, then, lies duty, responsibility? Surely in the development of the power of thought. Strengthen the I, build it up by seeking knowledge, by observation, by desire towards the unfailing source of knowledge, answered always by induction, by reaching out for at-one-ment with the Principle of Being, the only god, past, present and future, by which I am and in which the I shall be eternally—this is life, this is being, this is the I that shall be—even as God is—infinite in unfoldment, eternal in existence, omniscient, omnipresent, omnipotent. A SPIRITUAL LESSON.

NATURE'S RESURRECTION—WHAT IT TEACHES US.

Gorgeous colors, brilliant plumage, beautiful cloud effects does Nature put on now. Yea, verily, she doth revel in color, in beauty, and the miracle of awakening spring is most wondrous, typical indeed of the wonderful resurrection of the spirit when it is released from the clayey envelope that is its protection, its covering while it tarries here upon earth. When this tomb shall open and the spirit occupant shall freely step out into the beauty and glory of spirit life, leaving behind the dross of earth life—the natural body—then shall be the same onward, progressive movement, if the individual has lived worthily his earth life, has developed his talents, his faculties; has grown in reason, in capacity, and has fitted himself for existence the the realm just ahead, the realm whose portals we call death.

The putting off of the mortal is only what all new spring life is now doing; the dainty blue violet whose face mirrors the dome of blue ether above it, and whose beauty is but the outgrowth of last year's work of storage in the roots and leaves, culminating in the thing of beauty that adds joy and comfort to earth's patient toilers—if only they have a cultured eye to see it, and a beautiful soul to feel the glory, the harmony, the joy that is the privilege of each soul, if only he be in harmony with nature's typical resurrection.

"There is a grandeur in the pathless woods" writes that great poet; there is a glory that this world doth put on that is the blessing mundane, the sweetness of sunshine, the glory of earth life typified—beautified if only the mind of man is educated to know how much of wonderful beauty there is in the grass at our feet.

What a miracle of sweetness in the lily of the valley; what a promise of heaven in the golden face of even the humble dandelion!

Does earth seem dark and damp? raise your eyes to see the opening flower whose fairy face conceals enough of beauty to bring a promise of what will be but an additional unfoldment of loveliness when we leave behind us the beauty terrestrial, if we are thus prepared to take upon us the beauties celestial.

When all of earth's people are educated to drink in all of beauty there is in the earth life of nature—when our people have made their own the beauty in flower, in leaf and in tree, then will the spiritual sense begin to assimilate, to feed upon that absorbed food for the mind, and grow into harmony with nature's seasonable unfoldment.

Don't crush your aspirations after beauty! Don't crucify the love of a beautiful object, but gaze upon them till through them you can realize the life of beauty that is the heritage, the possibility, of every mortal man or woman.

There has been among some a false idea, that art contained more of beauty than nature; but only as art can approach the beauty of nature and preserve the same, is she worthy of a name. Art is the perpetuator of natural beauty, not the creator in any sense, and when the two are in perfect harmony, and the mind of the artist is filled with the glory of nature's works, is he ready to begin to copy from nature which is the inspiration of art. The most successful artists that have ever lived have made their reputation by their close study of, and their power of interpreting nature, and in their almost perfect imitation of her beauties has their success been evident.

Do artists—real ones, true ones—follow their own bent, giving their imagination full play, produce a masterpiece that will live in the hearts of men as long as time shall last? No, truly. Only when the artist's heart is overflowing with the beauty, the love of the object he is trying to reproduce, when he buries self and lives in the heart of his work, his creation, does he produce anything that might really be a "triumph of art."

Apollo, Venus! beautiful! oh, so full of perfect natural beauty! The very soul of the author is worked into the marble block, as well as the noble manhood that he is living, and the principles of his own being has he chiseled into the stony block.

The power arising from these creations is a force, a marvelous educator, and always will be. So long as man can speak will he continue to rave of the glory of these statues

Do you want to develop a man? cultivate his love of the beautiful in art, in science, in music. If you want to make him religious, make his religion a thing of beauty, or it will not be to him a joy evermore. Our race needs, more than any other one thing, to learn to know beauty wherever found, whenever seen, and they will gradually leave out of their lives those ugly things that mar, that demolish; for a soul, a mind full of beauty has no room for those foul, loathsome weeds that, if allowed, will choke the germs of life immortal whose very soul is beauty.

The most useful, most beautiful lives we know are those who work out their time by the light of a beautiful mind, a clean heart, and an enlightened, cultured reason.

I saw a pure white lily yesterday, and the purity of the blossom filled me all that day, and I thought of the sweet-faced baby who only came for a little while to brighten, to purify my life, and who drooped and faded away, leaving only the remembrance of a heavenly lily to bless me while I lived, and the inspiration to make of my soul the abode of heavenly purity while I walked the streets of this earthly city, and lived in this mortal tenement. Heavenly beauty! How thinly sometimes the veil intervenes between that fair city and me! How short seems the road, how sweet the music, if only we are the pure, the noble souls we might be—we ought to be.

True, honest souls, living out their lives in the full discharge of duty, in the highest possible light of all the reason, all the beauty, that may be their inheritance or environment, perfecting a white soul to finally enjoy the results of a well-lived-out earth life, eternal, life immortal, when this mortal shall put on immortality.

Cursed be he who would blot, who would soil the purity of one of the lowliest of earth's flowers; who would bring trouble unnecessarily upon "even the least of these"—saith the great teacher—he of Nazareth.

We must have right-minded, pure-hearted men and women, who will draw their inspiration from nature's radiant face; who will drink deep from nature's fountain; who will go forth in the bright and glowing sun and list to nature's teachings.

The noble soul who draws deeply from nature's secrets, who lives in nature's mysteries, will tell you that the sweet communion, the solemn rest he enjoys is not to be found by him who is out of harmony with his own noble manhood, out of sympathy with perfect womanhood, and out of tune with the symphony played by hands unseen upon our hearts and minds by those who only a little while before us, have outgrown earth and have arisen to behold the light of a more beauteous morning—even life eternal.

A PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

PSYCHIC BODY.

THE MEANING OF A SCRIPTURE TEXT.

To the Editor:—With other valuable articles in your paper of January 30th, I read with deep interest and much pleasure the one by B. F. Sliter, entitled: "What is Life?" The mode of explaining force and spirit was excellent. My own way of treating the subject would be somewhat different, but every one has his own way. I am hardly ready to say that matter cannot be created or annihilated, for I am rather inclined to the notion that it is constantly coming into existence and perhaps passing from it. In more direct terms I regard spirit as the one primal substance underlying all things—the "real reality" of being, and manifest as love and intelligence. What we call matter appears to be its humbler negative—a something phenomenal which emanates from it, and not being or having life in itself, becomes the objective receptacle of life.

Creation and evolution are the next necessity and the next results. For love cannot subsist except there be an object to love; and so a universe and intelligent humanity are its necessary sequence and conjuncts. If matter ever came into existence by a supreme will that is eternal and ever-present, then it must be constantly coming into existence.

"Matter" and "Mature" have etymologically the same meaning—genetrix or mother. It denotes the mater or materia, the mother-principle, which, of course, presupposes spirit or the over-mind as the father-principle. Hence, as in the allegory of Eden, the woman, mother of all that live, was taken from the man (being his side, not rib), so the declaration of Paul holds true: "All things are out from God."

We are, however, in pretty deep water, and I refrain from wading out further. Besides, before one takes issue with what another says, it is due to candor to make sure of the exact meaning that he attaches to his words.

My worthy friend, of Grand Rapids, however, will bear with me when I venture to correct his application of a text in Paul's Corinthian Epistle. It reads: "There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body." He suggests the word "material" for "natural." The adjective in the Greek text does not admit of this. It is psuchikos from psuche, the soul. It should be rendered psychic, psychical or psychal. The same adjective occurs in other places in the Greek Testament. In I. Corinthians ii:14, it is rendered "natural," and in James iii:15, and Jude 19, "sensual." Of course it means of or partaining to the soul, and in all these places is contrasted with things that are spiritual. This is illustrated by the context, as I will show: "There is a psychic body and there is a spiritual body. And so also it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul (psuche); the last Adam a quickening spirit."

Even this does not give the legitimate full meaning of the Greek original, but it is not germane to the present subject to go into that. Let us hope that the men who are undertaking the Polychrome version will have sufficient courage, fidelity, intelligence and I may add spiritual insight to give the English-speaking world a Bible in the genuine sense as the writers meant. The canonicity, authority and inherent sanctity can then be more intelligently determined. A translation in which many of the readings are positively inaccurate, and many of the words have acquired a different meaning from what they had three centuries ago, ought to be set aside as obsolete.

THE ROSES.

The brooding sunshine fills the skies
And from the roses' brimming eyes
Smiling archly with dewy lips
A thrill from head to finger-tips
Breathing perfume on the air
Beams the roses everywhere,
All the air grows wondrous sweet,
Overhead and underfeet—
Underfeet and overhead—
From the roses white and red.
Like rosy children's faces white
Aglow with innocence and light.
Pink and yellow, pale and bright,
Nod the roses with delight.
From my couch I wake to smile,
And my weariness beguile,
As I watch the golden dawn
While the earth seems new-born,
Freshly kindling in my heart
Strength to do my humble part
Undismayed, though changes come,
Every change shall be welcome,
Looking back to say good-by
When my twilight hour draws nigh.

Lucid Statements Illustrating the Fact that Spiritualism Antedates the Fox Sisters at Hydesville, N. Y.

FACTS OF HISTORY.

SPIRITUALISM — OUTSIDE OF SPIRITUALISTS—IT HAS EXISTED THROUGHOUT ALL THE AGES PAST.

"Truth is a suppliant who, standing before the threshold, is forever pressing towards the hearth from which it has been banished. As we pass before the door, that majestic and mournful figure fixes for a moment our distracted attention; we have not been able to repudiate the truth, we still retain what of its light our enfeebled eye can bear, the rest we reject or disfigure—we retain the name of things we no longer possess."—Vinet's "Vital Christianity."

"The Christian system of the spiritual and material world stood for fifteen years unshaken. All at once the monk Copernicus stood forth; with a mighty hand he pushed away the Globe from the center of creation, fixed the Sun in its place, and bade the former make the circuit of the latter, in a year and revolve upon its own axis in 24 hours. By this fortunate discovery much that was incomprehensible became intelligible, and much that was inexplicable, demonstrable. The clergy threatened curse and excommunication, but Copernicus was gone—the earth was now in motion, and no anathema was able to arrest its progress. Encouraged by this the physical philosophers fought still harder against the church, and soon promulgated the doctrine that there was nothing in the world but matter and its properties; they delved in matter and finding nothing by their tests but matter, they declared there no powers but material."—Stillings' "Pneumatology."

Still there was the spirit of truth whom the world cannot receive, because the world seeth him not" (St. John 14—57) "Lo I am with you alway" that is the spirit of truth which has always been, "is now and ever shall be."

"In Jewish history, whence chiefly originates the spiritual faith of the Christian people, supernaturalism reigns supreme; from Pisgah, Carmel, Ararat and Sinai, it streams down in dazzling splendor, it illumines the tents and palm shades of the ancient patriarchs; from the wilderness, cities and streams of Judea it comes; it is the imperishable manna from God; it is the heaven-promised heritage of the faithful to the end of time, "Lo! I am with you alway." Churches of every shade claim Spiritualism as their own, and revivers of the faded glories of past faiths claim to be reinvested with it. Derided by material philosophy, it lives on regardless of it; wherever literature extends Spiritualism stamps the page; wherever man lives with nature, it lives with man; with Plato, Socrates, Seneca, Tacitus and Cicero—men worshiped for their mighty intellects—Spiritualism was a worshipful guest, and a mighty power."

In this enquiry, though distinct from professed Spiritualists, we do not have to pry into obscure corners for Spiritualism; we meet it as legion; it is enthroned in all temples and seated in every hall, college, cottage or tent; its phenomena are more forced on us than sought by us; and so large are the harvests of facts, that we can store but a small percentage in our historic barns, and those given here will be but an ear plucked here, and an odd grain there, for to give all would be to nearly repeat all history. Yet this is the thing some of the wiseacres of to-day doubt and deny; a professor Heller on the one hand and a De Witt Talmage on the other, have never met the phenomena, ergo they do not exist. They are like the fly on the acorn, which could not realize that totality of a whole seed to say nothing of the tree itself. So much by way of introduction and now to proceed to subject proper.

THE PARSEES, OR FIRE-WORSHIPERS.

It is well-known that amongst all ancient nations there was prevalent a belief in Spiritualism, and that spiritual phenomena were common to them; amongst the ancient Egyptians were diviners who in various manners cultivated amongst themselves, discovered the Will of the Divine Mind. Some of these had a natural gift in that way, and were called oracles; others cultivated the art by various spells, drugs, herbs, etc., and were named sorcerers, while amongst the Brahmins of India, and fire-worshipers of the East, these singular spells were wrought, the highest God, that of Light, dwelt in the sun and His principal power was manifested in fire; hence the name Parsee of fire-worshiper. Again there were amongst them several sects or societies each of which practiced divination in its own way and had its own secrets (revealed only to their highest officers, the Magi) some of which secrets and signs are said to have been transmitted by them down through the ages to their present representatives on earth—the freemasons. It is also singular and worthy of note that among the Persians there existed a sect of solitary monks who dwelt in caves and denied themselves every luxury—the Dervishes—who were known to possess to a remarkable extent the gift of tongues and other gifts as well, and to such a degree were they cultivated that they became at last the chief exponents of sorcery and magic in the world.

The Egyptians no doubt borrowed much of this from these eastern nations, but amongst the Egyptians themselves it is first found incorporated with a form of natural worship—the Ahriman and Ormuzd of the Persians became the Osiris and Isis of the Egyptians. They studied the arts and the sciences more persistently and advanced in knowledge and power, and with wealth, splendor and luxury, they forgot their first love, turned their back upon inspiration, departed from the truth, and their Oracles became pretenders, their inspired mediums frauds, their religion form and ceremony, and their philosophy materialistic. The veiled and pure Isis and the unseen Osiris were forgotten for Deities of a depraved order and their power crumbled away. The shadows of that vast and faded power, the monu-to-day in the pyramids and sphinx.

The Romans and Greeks, however, even in their highest state of advancement, and in the very foundation of their government, held to the distinct inspiration of their gods; as instance, when Lycurgus in establishing his model government of Sparta went and consulted the Delphic Oracle as to the laws he should frame, the voice of the oracle being always listened to by the wise, learned and good of that people.

HEBREW INSPIRATION.

Then we have the Hebrews, who held communication with Jehovah, the one God; and amongst them a secret order the Caballa, from which came inspirational writings attributed to Jehovah, but these writings criticised the Hebrew scriptures to such an extent that the devout Jews ignored them, in the same way as secret societies, to this day, are condemned by the church; yet the proofs are undoubted that they had secret sources of inspiration, and held communion with unseen powers. All this the outside Hebrews themselves acknowledged, but declared the communion was with unhallowed spirits, and condemned it as sorcery and witchcraft, only accepting such inspiration as came to the world through the order of their priesthood; yet their priesthood, too, became corrupt, and their greatest secret, which they were not permitted to more than breathe, was the name of their Deity, and Moses himself proclaimed Jehovah openly to the people, so in time their power and inspiration also passed away.

Now though much was done by the powerful in all these nations to crush out inspiration, there was still left a remnant of the faithful, who had not forgotten their God, and amongst the Persians, Greeks and Romans, more than amongst the Hebrews, there was abroad a spirit of expectancy—a watching for the new revelation—the coming man so long foretold. Who were the first to discover in the the Christ babe the long-look-for reformer? The Eastern heathen Magi, guided by the star; they came and exemplified their work (probably of some secret order) bringing gifts to the babe, showing that inspiration was not crushed out amongst the heathen in these days any more than to-day; and you will doubtless remember how Herod the king desired the Magi on their return to let him know where the "young child lay," but they were warned not to do so, but to depart in peace to their own country, showing that some angel or spirit had spoken to them through their inspirations, as well as to those who were the direct descendants of the Hebrew prophets. One most remarkable feature of this matter is that, whilst other nations were ready to receive this new advent, the Jews rejected Him, and except the few who followed Him in His wanderings, the Hebrew scholars and devotees did not receive Him; so their inspiration was lost, their church was dead, and more spirituality, more life, more love, was found amongst the heathen.

MODERN INSPIRATION.

Coming down to more recent times, how common are spiritual manifestations amongst all people, except, of course, those who are particularly well learned and whose personal wisdom is far beyond that of ordinary mortals; indeed how frequently we find the best mediums to be reputed as fools, weak and vacillating, even sometimes "babes and sucklings" and unfortunately, too often laying themselves open to the slanderous tongues of vicious men worse by far than themselves. Talking of fools, here was one: Gomiates relates in his life of Angelus that "when the Emperor was at Redostos he paid a visit to a man called Basilicus who had the reputation of possessing the faculty of seeing into futurity, but who was otherwise regarded by all sensible persons as a fool; Basilicus received the Emperor without any marks of respect, and instead of answering his questions, walked over to the Emperor's picture, scratched out the eyes and tried to strike the hat off his head." The Emperor set him down as a perfect fool, but it all happened he was deposed by his brother Alexis and his eyes put out; he was a fool but he was a clairvoyant.

Claus, the court fool at Weimar, rushed at one time in amongst the sitting councillors and exclaimed: "You are consulting about very important matters, but no one thinks of the fire raging at Colmar." On arrival of the mail it was found an alarming fire was devasting the city; another fool but a clairvoyant.

At Perouse, in 1616, a priest named Jacques, while celebrating mass turned round to the people and instead of saying "orate fratres," etc., he exclaimed: "Orate pro castris ecclesiae quae laborant in extremis," which is, "pray for the church's army which is in extreme danger;" and at that moment the army was being defeated about twenty-five leagues from Perouse. Under similar circumstances Apollonius of Tyana, in the middle of a lecture at Ephesus, suddenly announced the death of Domitian at Rome.

St. Cyprian in his epistles has a letter from one Fermilianus (in the third century) who tells of a woman who fell into ecstatic fits in which she "foretold extraordinary things which came true, did marvelous things and performed real miracles." Both the early fathers and the woman attributed these effects to spirits; probably they, too, were fools but mediums.

Fernalius tells us of a gentleman who was attacked by convulsions daily or oftener and who in these fits spoke Greek and Latin; told the thoughts of those around him, and twitted the physicians on their ignorance of his trouble. It was discovered, however, that the secret of the whole trick was magnetism, even though this peculiar force called itself a spirit, it was not so. Now, which was the most consummate folly? to believe that it was an invisible intelligence, or that it was dead though subtile matter teaching the classics?

You have all heard of the many cases of cured diseases by the wiping with napkins brought from the tomb of the Abbe Paris in 1731, some hundred and odd years ago. It may seem ridiculous that such means should be used. but testimony as to the facts are beyond question; why then should we doubt ancient history which informs us that all manner of diseases were cured by napkins taken from the body of St. Paul, or that the woman was cured of her long standing issue by touching the hem of Christ's garment?

Cotton Mather says nothing was "so common for the old set of Quakers as to cure and convert people by merely stroking or breathing upon them; and Olaus Magnus says that amongst the Laplanders, after certain ceremonies, there were people who fell into a profound slumber, and gave information of events transpiring at far distant places, and in many cases on waking, had a distinct recollection of their visit to those places. Of course it is well-known that the Catholic Church through all its existence, did, and does still acknowledge spiritual manifestation, but, unfortunately, like the ancient Egyptians, Persians, Greeks, Romans and Jews, whatever inspiration happened outside of herself was unhallowed.

Again there were the numerous small, but heroic Protestant churches which arose chiefly about the 12th and 13th centuries, differing in many points one from another, but all rejecting the authority of Rome, yet in their diversity every one of them clinging to the ancient power of Christianity, claimed Spiritualism as their own. The histories of the Albigenses and the Waldenses are crowded with the spiritual, to say nothing of the smaller sects of Peter de Bruys, Eudo de Stella, etc.

LUTHER AND THE DEVIL.

Down through all these ages to the present century, through every religious schism, and in every shade of opinion, Spiritualism is manifested in a higher or lower degree, as circumstances would allow. Coming down nearer to our own time we would glance for a moment at the period of the Reformation, and I would here say that, as far as my limited knowledge of history extends, the most scientific, though most materialistic phase of religious opinion that ever existed found in the various sects of the Protestant faith dating from the Reformation. In their detestation of Roman corruption and Roman faith—nicknamed by them credulity—in their anxiety to cast away from themselves every semblance of popery, they sacrificed on their altar of appearances much that was noble, much that was true, and much that was grand. Coming out from the warm, nestling bosom of a church great and powerful, and coming out as they did, bare and shivering, refusing all miracles because some were false, and rejecting the very "gifts" of supernaturalism that God himself had given, they were hardened by the cold, and soured by the persecutions of the world, they rolled themselves up in themselves, for a little warmth, and blew upon themselves for a little life, and if there be a spark of life found in a Protestant church to-day, it is itself a spiritual manifestation and a miracle, after what they have done to crush it out; and yet the early reformers themselves could not have carried out their great work without Spiritualism. 'Tis true Luther said, "I do not desire that God should send an angel to me, and would not that He should send visions or revelations;" but after that the people—what a power there is in that people—brought a girl of 18 who was possessed of the devil. It would take too long to tell you all Luther said: suffice it to say, he hesitated, and that hesitation has been a blight and a curse on Protestantism. But the people were there, so Luther was under pressure and ordered her to repeat the Apostles Creed, which she did until she came to the name of Jesus Christ and could go no further; then Luther said: "I know thee, Satan; thou wouldst that I should talk with great parade. I will do no such thing." But the people were persistent and brought the girl again the following day, while Luther was preaching (probably their faith had more to do with the miracle than Luther's), so when she was thrown on the floor in convulsions. Luther laid his hand on her head and repeated the creed, the Lord's prayer, and the words of Jesus, "He that believeth in me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do," and I sometimes think how Christ-like his action was, for then he touched her with his foot, then said: "Thou proud Devil, I know thy head is crushed," and went away. The girl was taken home to her friends, and was no more troubled by the spirit. On another occasion, at Eisenach, a woman with hands and feet twisted like horns, swollen body, and her tongue dry and rough; she had been so for years, and Luther said it was the "direct work of the Devil." He however rebuked the spirit, prayed over her, and she responded Amen, slept soundly that night, and awoke next morning entirely cured.

Besides many such instances, Luther's biography teems with manifestations of the spirit; invariably, however, accredited to the Devil; in fact one would almost at times pity the Lord, for according to Luther He sometimes seemed like getting the worst of it.

On one occasion when at prayer a vision of the Lord appeared to him showing the five wounds so distinctly that he thought Christ present in the flesh; on reflection, however, he knew it must be some juggling of the Devil, so he said: "Avoid thee, confounded Devil. I know no other Christ than Him who was crucified"—"wherefore," he says, "the vision vanished, clearly showing whence it came." Poor Luther thought it impossible to "quench the spirit."

In Luther's Table Talk there are scores of pages relating his conversations, argument, etc., with invisible personages, alway devils, even when they enjoin him to give up his errors; he will accept the advice, but will declare it was the Devil; he rejected the supernatural in the Catholic Church, and said it was all the Devil, and when surrounded with it in his own church and experience, it was the Devil there too. He says: "Many devils are in the woods, waters and dark poolly places, ready to hurt people. I see him there, not far off, puffing out his cheeks till they are red, blowing against the light." When there was a great storm he said: "It is the Devil does this; the winds are nothing else but good and bad spirits." "Satan produces all the maladies of mankind." "The lame, blind and dumb, are men possessed by devils, and physicians who attempt to heal such cases are ignorant blockheads, who know nothing about the power of the demon." "In Poltersburg there is a lake in which if you throw a stone a storm arises and the whole neighborhood quakes; it is the devils kept there prisoners who occasion this." "Satan once tried to kill our prior by throwing down a wall on him, but God saved him." "Last Good Friday at Sassen the Devil carried off three grooms, who had devoted themselves to him."

Again, in 1521, when translating the Bible at Wartburg, the Devil interrupted him; he got mad and threw his ink bottle at his Satanic Majesty's head, and if you don't believe it, go to the castle at Wartburg and you will to this day see the ink on the wall where the bottle was smashed after passing through the Devil. To tell the truth, we think we would rather have been like Moses, believing every spirit to have been the Lord, than like Luther taking them all for the Devil. The poor fellow was much troubled in the night time, too, by the spirit voice; he would hear the spirit stamp across the room above, and come down behind the stove and then address him in a loud, sonorous voice; but he had not the knack of little Samuel, who said "speak, Lord," when he heard the voice; Luther would say: "Get away, thou Devil!" and I think the spirit must have had some pluck, for when he was talked to like that he would not go.

OTHER REFORMERS.

But we can't stay longer with Luther, much as we like his company, for we have said enough to show that this great father of the Reformation was, even if he knew it not, like many others a believer in Spiritualism. Numerous instances of the supernatural might be given of the other reformers Melancthon, Beza, Calvin, Knox, etc., but to take one instance more, and then proceed: George Wishart, the Scottish martyr, after a whole life of spiritual episodes, was captured and condemned to death by Cardinal Beatoun. The Cardinal, surrounded by his prelates, reclined on rich silken cushions, at the tower window, where they might witness the abominably shameful and cruel sentence carried out. When the stake was ready to which he was tied, George Wishart, who had knelt in prayer, was raised from his knees, and said: "Father of Heaven, I commend my spirit into thy holy hands;" the pyre was then lit and the powder, fastened to his body, blew up. Seeing he was still alive, the captain bade him be of good cheer. When he opened his eyes, amid the leaping, crackling, devouring flames and said: "My spirit is undaunted, but he who from yonder place beholdeth me with such pride, shall in a few days only, lie in the same, as ignominiously as he is now seen proudly to rest himself!" Only a few weeks later, the castle was surprised, the Cardinal put to death, and his body hung out at the same window from which he enjoyed the execution of his orders. The spirit of prophecy was with the martyr in death.

MODERN SPIRITUALISM. JOHN WESLEY.

Now having shown that, as far back as history would carry us, down through the ages, Spiritualism was alive ere Spiritualists were born, we arrive at the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and will take a hurried glimpse at these ere we conclude.

In the eighteenth century religious society seemed to be divided into two extremes, each running wildly in their own way; the one towards ceremony, formalism and ritualism; the other towards material rationalism; while the fruit they bore between them was a hybrid—a mule, barren of results, without continued life, therefore ending in death. Just at this point, when humanity's wants created the demand, nature provided the supply, and John Wesley and his contemporaries step upon the scene. He was cradled in supernaturalism, and grew up and walked with spirits in his schoolboy rounds; the parsonage at Epworth was truly a "gate of heaven" where the spirit spake through the bars; another Bethel where the angels ascended and descended between Heaven and Earth. The manifestations of spirits there were both remarkable and astounding, a long account of which was written by John Wesley and published by him in the Arminian Magazine. Having had such unquestionable proof of spiritual agency in his youth and in his own family, he held fast by his faith in it throughout his whole remarkable career. I need not say that his brother Charles, as indeed the whole Wesley family, were like himself, believers in Spiritualism, and that he gave it freely as his opinion, that "the reason why the gifts of the Holy Spirit are no longer to be found in the Christian church is because the Christians are turned heathen again, and have only a dead form left." Is there have only a dead form left."—Is there a faithful follower of John Wesley who reads this article.' If so he is a Spiritualist.

MOTHER ANN LEE.

One more, in or about the year 1758, Ann Lee, the daughter of an English blacksmith, conceived, she had an inspiration from Heaven, and becoming the head of a small society in Lancashire, a few Quakers and others joined her, when, to escape persecution, they set out for America, arriving in the States about 1774. In 1776, I understand, they founded their first establishment, near Albany, and to-day, I suppose there are at least a score of Shaker communities throughout the country. They declare that all through their existence they have had the gifts of healing, prophecy, speaking in tongues, etc., and aver, that they have been led by the spirit in all their experiences. Elder Frederick Evans, the head of the Shaker society, informed the writer, in the presence of J. M. Peebles, about twenty years ago, that the rise of "Modern Spiritualism" was predicted, seven or eight years before its advent, within their community, and claims that without Spiritualism they would have had no existence. I regret to know that the good old man is not now laboring in his earthly vineyard, having passed on to the harvest. Then again Orson Pratt, perhaps the most reliable advocate of the Mormon Church, claims that their church has been founded, not alone on the blood of their martyrs, but upon spiritual signs and wonders, and miraculous gifts of the spirit; and there is not much to be said against this, unless it were proved false, for every church, or sect, except the general Protestant church, claims the same thing; the Roman and the Greek, the Waldenses, the Camisards, the Quakers, and many individuals even amongst the Protestants, assert the same claims. We do not wonder, then, that Orson Pratt, should say, claiming as he does a spiritual origin for his church, that, "wherever people enjoy true religion, they enjoy visions, ministry of angels, etc., and wherever they cease to enjoy these blessings, they cease to enjoy true religion;" and again, "New revelation is the very life and soul of religion, and is indispensably necessary in the church." In these matters he was right, and I feel free to say, if the Mormons had only remained true Mormons, and not introduced polygamy into the church, there would not have been much the world could have laid to their charge.

Sometimes I have heard it claimed that Henry Ward Beecher was a Spiritualist, but he was always so extremely cautious that we think we had better place him outside the line; yet here is his testimony: "I have often been in that state which links us with a higher and better life, one of the occasional openings into the other world, a state in which the invisible world is more potent and real, than the visible world, and in which we see through the body and discern the substance of eternal truths;" while his brother, the Rev. Chas. Beecher, who was appointed to investigate the subject, by the Congregational Association of New York, comes out quite boldly with the report in its favor, and advocates Spiritualism, though not a Spiritualist. Theodore Parker, who was also outside the line, yet bears this testimony: "This party has an idea, wider and deeper, than Catholic or Protestant, namely that God still inspires men as much as ever, that He is immanent in spirit, and in space." On one occasion Dr. Gardener invited the governor, council and legislature of Massachusetts to investigate the matter; a committee of members was appointed, and thirty or forty intelligent tests were given, the committee reporting their belief that every thing was fair and there was neither collusion nor fraud; this committee, gave their testimony for Spiritualism though they were not Spiritualists.

The Rev. T. L. Harris, is frequently claimed as a Spiritualist, but there are many who refuse to yield that claim, because for some years he cut himself away from their associations; but whether he would acknowledge it or not, his testimony has always been earnest and fervent in its favor, and when he was busy with burning eloquence preaching the New Gospel, in the old country, he suddenly stopped, in his triumphant career, cancelled all his engagements and proved himself a prophet, as well as a preacher; for hastening home, he declared it had been revealed to him, that the "nethermost hells were to be let loose in America." The breach 'twixt North and South soon followed to prove his prediction.

In 1858, before the Italian revolution had broken out, in the presence of an English lady, (Miss Bremer,) at a certain convent in Rome, Sister Genevieve, under prophetic influence, raised her arms, foretold the fall of the temporal power of the Pope, and bloodshed and revolution, but out of which the church would come, holy, pure and renovated. She of course was no Spiritualist.

A very remarkable prophecy, by an American Quaker, Joseph Hoag, of the various schisms in that and other religious societies, of an outbreak amongst the freemasons and lastly of the American Civil War was printed and in circulation years before among the Friends. They are not Spiritualists.

As for knockings, there seems to have been no age or country without them. Cases of bell-ringing are numerous, aye innumerable, amongst people who were not Spiritualists. Clairvoyance has been known all over the world, under various names, and from time immemorial, it has been recognized in Scotland as "second sight." Spirit writing also has been wide spread, indeed universal—not only mechanical but independent. Since the days the spirit finger wrote the Mosaic law on Sinai, or the spirit hand wrote on Belshazzar's palace wall, down to the present time; yet with all this, the prophecy of Isaiah is again fulfilled, that "Hearing, they should hear and not understand, seeing, they should see and not perceive." Let us thank God, if we have received the spirit, clasped the vanished hand, or heard the echoes of the voice that is still.

KEELY'S PHILOSOPHY.

REVIEWED BY QUAESTOR VITAE—MIND, MATTER, AND RHYTHMICAL RELATIONS.

Keely conceives the basic Universal element to consist in a force which includes both mind, matter and manifests itself in rhythmical relations. These rhythmical relations have been experimentally found to express themselves in triune modes of vibration, bearing the relation of thirds and may be defined as assimilative, individualizing and resultant.

He describes the triune manifestations of this force as:

Positive, radiating, propulsive, dispensive, enharmonic; negative, focalizing, neg-attractive, polarizing, Harmonic; etheric, celestial, Dominant.

None of these can exist independently. All three are present in every stream of force. Their relations are as 33 1-3: 66 2-3: 100.

These three modes of vibration exist in six different orders of atomic subdivision of matter, or of vibratory motion of which we are capable of cognition. Molecular, Inter-molecular, Atomic, Inter-atomic, Etheric, Inter-etheric.

Material aggregation is caused by the second law, that of focalization or negative affinity or attraction, which meeting in mutual affinity or equilibrium, establishes a neutral center of attraction, where the vibratory forces of all three orders are held in sympathetic coincidence or harmonized motion; that is, balanced activity, entailing temporary suspension of propulsive radiating activity and consequently latent force.

It is the molecules that are the true centers of equated force held in perpetual neutralized oscillation. That they are formed of all three modes of vibration is shown from the fact that they respond to all the three modes of concordant impulse. The chord of a given mass of matter is the same as the chord of every molecule of the mass, as each must represent the same note in its oscillatory motion. They are centers of harmonized vibrations, held in temporary suspension by laws identical with those of resonance. These centers can be broken up by certain orders of vibration, or resonant induction, disturbing their equation. Every mass consists, therefore, of vibrations in harmonic equilibrium, related in proportions of thirds and consequently in harmonic relation or sympathy to every other mass or motion.

This sympathy may be increased or decreased by resonance, that is, by harmonic vibrations, which bring out in acoustics, what the microscope reveals to vision. If the harmonious balance of the three orders of force held in equation in the neutral centers of the aggregated mass, is disturbed, then the latent force existing in the neutral centers is released. This is the foundation of Keely's discovery.

Keely disturbs this oscillatory equilibrium and alters the relations of the three orders of vibratory force constituting the molecules, by resonant impulses set up by striking the same chord in three octaves, representing the third, sixth and ninth of the scale.

The sixth or Harmonic reduces the range of molecular oscillations and increases solidification. The ninth or Enharmonic extends the range of molecular oscillations and increases the tensity. The third or Dominant induces rearrangement of the modes of vibration into another form, or transforms the mass into its initial forces.

He can discover the chord of any mass, by a few acoustic tests. He seeks to alter the dominant or etheric mode of vibration in the triple flow of force. The three metals—gold, silver and platinum—give vibrations equal to 3: 6: 9—a wire made in these three metals transmits concordant impulses in those proportions. The interaction of the dominant and enharmonic elements of the triple flow of the current gives rise to rotation.

Science asserts that molecular aggregation is attended with dissipation of energy. But Keely shows that molecular aggregation is attended with the absorption of energy and that incalculable amounts of latent force exist in molecular specks, imprisoned by the infinite velocity of molecular rotation. This latent energy accumulated in molecular aggregation may be awakened and brought into intense vibratory action, by the means of sympathetic liberation, that is, stimulating resonance from without. Consequently all corpuscles and atoms of matter may be divided and subdivided by a certain order of vibration concordant with their mass chord.

Disturbance of equilibrium and sympathetic equation constitute the dual power that governs all the varied forms of life and motion that exist terrestrically; of which the electric and magnetic is the prime mover and regulator. Molecular differentiation is the dragon that wrecks the physical world, using the seat of the cerebral forces as its intermediate transmitter. The system of equating molecular differentiation is the St. George that will conquer.

The luminiferous ether is the one substance of which everything is composed. It is the great sympathetic, protoplastic element like itself. It is the celestial mind force, an inter-etheric element.

The substance of the brain is molecular, while the mind that permeates the brain is inter-etheric. The brain is the resonating receptacle, where the sympathetic celestial mind-flow acts. It becomes when thus excited part and parcel of the celestial itself; the finite is thus associated with the Infinite. This controlling media of the physical has its seat in the cerebral convolutions, from which it radiates as sympathetic emanation and this sympathetic outreach is mind-flow proper, or will force. The action of mind is a vibratory-etheric evolution controlling the physical by successive orders of transmission, etheric, atomic, molecular. Animal magnetism is the transmitive link of sympathy in the inter-atomic subdivision of matter. It is the etheric flow and not the magnetic or electric, that sends its currents along our nerves.

The action of the celestial mind-flow produces the motion of the molecules in all vegetable and mineral forms of Nature. It is the controlling medium of the Universe. All forces in Nature are mind-forces—magnetic, electric, galvanic, acoustic, solar, polar-terrestrial: all are governed by triune streams of celestial affinity, as also the molecular and intermolecular, the atomic and inter-atomic. These are all modifications of the One force, and all are composed of triple flows, carrying positive and negative radiation, or propulsive and attractive outreach. The positive vibrations are the radiating or propulsive; negative vibrations are the ones that are attracted towards the neutral centers. The rotation of the earth is controlled and continued by the action of the positive and negative sympathetic streams which make it into a great magnet. It is these sympathetic flows which regulate the motion of planetary masses in their relation to each other. These flows may be compared to the field of a magnet.

It will be noticed that Keely's system presents many analogies with the teachings of occult schools. The Universe, both etheric and material, is constituted of one element, comprising mind, substance and force. This element exists in six different modes (degrees; states; planes) with inter-connecting links, the finer of which permeate and control the grosser. The mutual inter-action of the implicit positive and negative forces produce rotation or circulation, entailing individuation; while the inherent negative attraction tends to focalization or materialization. The positive radiation, again, by increasing the tenuity, refines. These forces as described suffice to account for self-particularization (individuation) and for a circle of "becoming" from an ethereal to material state and back again to tenuity. And the existence of these forces has been experimentally demonstrated and made the basis for the mechanical liberation of almost unharnessable energy. But of course "official" science will "deny," for a generation or two to come.

His experimental exposition is of course limited to states coming within human cognition and consequently not pertaining to what have been called spiritual states. Yet he has been able to deal with the force pertaining to etheric states and which is only cognizable in its effects, induced in lower orders. This would imply that he had intuitively grasped a law pertaining to the plane of effects, and consequently in unison with the cause thereof, which has its prior field in domains transcending human perception, whether these be called spiritual, psychical, or vital.

QUAESTOR VITAE.

TOLD BY PEARL BRYAN'S SPIRIT.

Confession of the Murderers Recalls a Seance Held Last March.

Anderson, Ind.:—Last March an account of a seance held by Mrs. Thiebald of Muncie at the Indiana Spiritualists camp ground, in which Pearl Bryan appeared, was sent out from this city and published in Cincinnati and Chicago papers. It attracted but little attention at the time, but now Spiritualists hold it up with pride as being in line with the confession of Walling and Jackson in point of details.

The headless spirit, according to the account, appeared in the room.. From her neck, where the head should be, came a voice, and it told a story in which the spirit claimed to be that of Pearl Bryan. She said she had passed into a stupor like death, and those who were around her thought her dead. One was a strange doctor, but with him were Walling and Jackson. They grew desperate when she went into this deathlike stupor. She could understand and see everything, but could not move a muscle. At last, in order to remove all traces, they cut off her head.

The spirit said she suffered agony that could not be described. She felt the knife applied and also felt the rush of blood to her neck, and then the spirit of a dead sister came to her and took her spirit away. She says the head was wrapped up and the spirit lost sight of it and could not find it.

The scene was a weird and ghastly one and will never be forgotten by those who witnessed the seance. After she had told the story the headless body dematerialized in the center of the room without returning to the cabinet.

VERY SIGNIFICANT.

The Progressive Thinker leads. It publishes more reading matter than any other dollar Spiritualist paper on this green earth. It was the only Spiritualist paper that had enterprise enough to publish President Barrett's address before the National Convention at Washington. It covered three pages of the paper. It now proposes to send out 1,000,000 copies of the paper containing his address.

Read the announcement on fifth page, headed "Fifteen Cents," for particulars.

The To-Morrow of Death,
···OR THE···
Future Life According to Science.
BY LOUIS FIGUIER.
TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH
BY S. R. CROCKER.
A VERY FASCINATING WORK.
This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author is not a Spiritualist—he even mentions Spiritualists as "devotees of a new superstition," etc., etc., in which he manifests the usual animus of the "scientific class," yet he says again: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of Earth;" and he goes on to relate instances of fact in evidence. There is, to a Spiritualist, a manifest discrepancy in the author's ideas, but the well-read mind will readily select and arrange the pros and cons, and out of the whole will find not only good mental culture, but much valuable information. The author holds the theory of reincarnation. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

MAN —IN THE—
PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.
A POPULAR ACCOUNT OF
Results of recent scientific research regarding the origin, position and prospects of mankind.
From the German of
DR. LUDWIG BÜCHNER,
Author of "Force and Matter," Essays on Nature and Science," "Physiological Pictures," "Six Lectures on Darwin," Etc.
"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable. When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only our personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our race, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—in short, in the entire material and physical contribution which, during our short personal existence, we have furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of nature in general."—Buechner.

PERFECT MOTHERHOOD;
Or Mabel Raymond's Resolve.
BY LOIS WAISBROOKER. THIS IS a novel written with a purpose, and that purpose is not merely to enable an unthinking, idle mind to while away the time in a state of idle blessedness, devoid of earnest thought or care for either self-improvement or the good of humanity. It is a book designed especially, primarily, for mothers and those who are to be mothers; and secondly, through the mothers, to effect the well-being and happiness of the race. It brings strongly and clearly to view the result upon the child of proper surroundings and influences bearing upon the mother previous to maternity. Incidentally the author touches upon various things in modern social and business life, which are unjust, and fix unequal burdens upon the individuals composing society as a whole. The book is trenchant, instructive and very interesting, even when regarded merely as a novel, and is especially commended to "women everywhere," to whom it is dedicated. It also thoroughly shows up the Jesuitical spirit of the Catholic Church; advanced ideas relating to the Spiritual philosophy are introduced. It contains a fine likeness of the author. It contains 345 pages, neatly bound in cloth. Price by mail, prepaid, $1.

PEN-FLASHES FROM OHIO.

BY C. H. MATHEWS.

WICKED PEOPLE

who live in the natural gas regions had better beware: Evangelist C. Fenwick Reed, of the M. E. church at Shelbyville, Ind., has been holding "wonderful meetings," and in January, notwithstanding the low temperature, had everybody redhot: "I came here thinking that this was a spiritual church. This is one of the worst towns outside of hell, and evidently drawing closer daily, and only about fity miles from hell. There must be in the 1,200 members some stinking carcasses. If they don't face about, they will march hand in hand with Satan into hell. I would advise the gas company in digging wells not to go too deep, as hell is less than fifty miles away." The sulphurous preacher is only twenty-seven years old, but he evidently has a "mission" to perform. He comes from London, England, and is determined to save the wicked people of Shelbyville from "the wrath to come." The press and people are indignant, however, at such hell-begotten preaching, and called for an apology from clergyman Reed. They will have none of his gassy diatribes. This is fun for the "infidels" and wicked "Spiritualists," and they smile serenely.

LACKS THE DIVINE FIRE.

I have ofttimes reverted to the lethargy in the Church, and its utter inadequacy to do the people any good as at present constituted. Now comes Rev. Don S. Colt, of the M. E. church, Allegheny, Pa. (Feb. 7.) and says: "A deal of the preaching of to-day is merely moral and ethical, and it lacks the divine fire. It is not because the power of God is any less, but because men have fallen short of the purposes of God. I would defend with my life the statement that the world has had enough of theology, and that what it wants is more Christ." The pastor earnestly invited the "brain and the brawn" of the two wicked cities, (Pittsburg and Allegheny,) to—

"Come to the Lord and seek salvation,
Sound the praise of his dear name;
Glory, honor and redemption,
Christ, the Lord, has come to reign."

Hundreds have been "converted,' and the work goes bravely on. There, I told you so.

STUDENT OF THE OCCULT.

It has been alleged that Hon. Lyman J. Gage, secretary of the Treasury, has been "a student of the occult." That is probable. In fact, how could it be otherwise? Living in the progressive city of Chicago, where so many Spiritualists live and move and have their being, the very air is redolent of spiritual forces. Well, Abraham Lincoln and Mrs. Lincoln were Spiritualists and entertained angels, (and were well aware of their presence,) in the White House. The action of President McKinley, when governor of Ohio, four years ago, as set forth in these columns March 13th, 1897, should encourage Spiritualists all over the world. Religious persecutors will have to take back seats.

NOTABLE OCCASION.

Brother Francis Rice, of Freeville, N. Y., has a very timely and suggestive column in the Thinker No. 378, in regard to the Spiritualists' celebration at Rochester and Hydesville, N. Y. This ought to be a notable occasion, and all Spiritualists should put forth their best efforts to make March 31, 1898, a red letter day in our history.

SAM JONES,

the eccentric Georgia evangelist, is to get $2,000 and his expenses for a month's revival work in Boston. So says the Boston Transcript. They might have a grand spiritual outpouring which would be of some practical good for about half that amount of money.

HEATHENISM IN PHILADEPHIA.

At the University of Pennsylvania, in the City of Brotherly Love, March 6, the students 150 strong, got on a rampage on the campus and beat and abused a poor Japanese student in the school and trampled him into insensibility. Then a general fight ensued and much blood was spilled. The police were called in to command the peace. I only mention this trifling incident to emphathize the assertion of Grover Cleveland that this is in reality a Christian country and that we do enjoy the blessings of a Christian (!) government. No "Heathen Chinee" need apply.

KEEP SILENT.

The Baltimore conference of the M. E. church voted 100 to 65 (March 6) against the admission of women to the general conference. Well, St. Paul ordered the woman to keep silence in the churches, and is not the conference merely obeying the edicts of their great exemplars? Who's to blame? Let the clergy explain.

THE COLOR OF HIS SKIN.

At Sharon, Pa., March 6, a colored theological student, Mr. A. B. Anderson, somehow became objectionable to Prof. Hogue; has left the institution and gone home. A majority of the students, of course, sustained the professor; and now we are told "all is peace and harmony." It does not appear that there was much objection to the brother except the color of his skin.

SOCIAL TYRANNY.

In Dauphin county, Pa., children cannot be admitted to the public schools, unless they present a certificate that they have been vaccinated. This was the dictum of the common pleas judge, recently. What social tyranny and arrant cruelty to children!

LAZY MINISTERS.

Rev. Dr. N. Woodside Ref. Pres. church, Pittsburg, knew what he was talking about Sunday, January 17, when he castigated "the lazy ministers who are in the churches to-day. They are the most abominable of all the types of so-called ministers of God. They are tedious to listen to, and their congregations get cold and then melt away altogether." Many persons inside and outside the pale of the church know that thesethings are true. Orthodox religion has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Selah.

THE "SIGN OF THE CROSS" is a new play that is drawing the clergy and the stage closer. Rev. Dr. W. A. Stanton, of the Shady Ave. Baptist church, Pittsburg, took his wife and daughter to see the sacred performance. He says: "I do not attend the theater oftener than once or twice a year; but I believe it will do them good." Progress? In London it attracted the attention of the clergy universally. Why not?

Dr. Chadwick, of the Second Unitarian church, N. Y., says (Feb. 14,) that "men who are tearing down some of the old theories about the Bible are its best friends—the gentlest readers of the book."

ATTENUATED ORTHODOXY.

Rev. Dr. J. M. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, denounces Dr. Lyman Abbott's utterances: "If orthodoxy can be attenuated and made heterogeneous to the extent proposed by Dr. Abbott, it will have no more power against infidelity, false religion, or absorption in this material present life, than gold leaf and gauze would have against cannon balls and bullets." Dr. Abbott has severely criticised some of the "fish stories" in the holy book; and Dr. Buckley in substance charges him with making "ludicrous," serious things." When D. D.s disagree who shall decide? These criticisms are styled "revolutionary," and I agree that they are.

BEWITCHED.

An Ohio town "bewitched," is the way the newspapers print it. Richfield Center, Lucas Co., Ohio, is in the midst of a genuine witchcraft scare. Seventeen families, principally Germans, are afflicted with a peculiar malady: It seizes the whole family at the same time; they cannot sleep, and claim they are being pursued by black cats. The people believe it is the work of some "witch." Horses, cattle and sheep are victims of the disease. Physicians cannot diagnose the disease, but say it is possibly due to the unsanitary condition of the village. Spiritual philosophy unravels and explains many of these otherwise inexplicable maladies. Shakespeare says, "can'st thou not minister to a mind diseased?" Some pious people would blame all these uncanny things on their Devil, and dismiss it at that.

SHUTS OUT THE BIBLE.

Congress has enacted a law excluding all "lewd, or lascivious books" from the mails under a penalty of $5,000, or five years imprisonment, or both. This shuts out the Bible, provided anybody has the temerity to enforce the law.

"WAR IN HEAVEN,"

was the subject of a sensational sermon at Zion African M. E. church, at Pittsburg, Pa., Sunday evening, February 7. The learned pastor said: "There was a war for light, and light won. The phosphorus and zinc and other artificial illuminants were so arranged by God that light came, and a crowning victory was achieved. Another war, when God began to beautify the world by placing Adam in the garden; to make beasts harmless, and insects and other creeping things to obey the will of man, who having been left alone, was tempted of the Devil. A thousand legions of angels were enlisted into the service of God; Michael was the chief commander of God's armies, and Lucifer the chief of hell. The defeat of the Devil caused him to be thrust into an everlasting pit for a thousand years." He admonished his hearers to put on the whole armor of God and kill off the Devil at every opportunity. The colored brother was somewhat Talmagian in his sermon.

REPLETE WITH DELUSIONS.

The Detroit Evening News, a somewhat pretentious paper, thinks "There can be no doubt that the general practice of ghost-raising, whatever the theory of the thing may be, has degenerated into something that is little short of a vice; conducted under the sentimental guise of religion." Perhaps, if the learned editor would read his Christian Bible carefully, and without prejudice, he would find it replete with "delusions," that he now stigmatizes as "vicious." But, the world is destined to be kept in dense ignorance so far as the secular and so-called religious press are concerned. However, truth is mighty, and will eventually "cover the earth, even as the waters cover the sea." We can wait.

THE DEGENERATE CATHOLICS.

Two Catholic ladies of St. Louis, Mo., in the upper circles of society in that city, are engaged to be married (Feb. 11) to two gentlemen. This seems to be regular but it has caused a pronunciamento from Archbishop Kain, in which he informs the ladies that they will surely be excommunicated from the church, if they disobey his mandate. The bridesmaids and groomsmen will also be bounced. The men are Protestants, which explains the matter. "There may be cases where I would allow an infringement," said the bishop, "but no such case has yet come under my observation. It is not a general law of the church, but a diocesan regulation." Such a proposition is revolting to all ideas of civil and religious liberty. They will be married all the same. I wish them joy.

SO DIFFICULT.

Sam Jones said, in Boston, that the reason why going to heaven is that town is so difficult is because the streets are crowded with people going the other way. Shouldn't wonder.

SOMETHING OF A FARCE.

In empaneling a jury, (Jan. 19,) for the trial of Walter K. Freeman, who has been charged with assault, lawyer Brooke, for the defense was careful to ask each one of the talesman jurors as to his spiritualistic tendencies? It is said the lawyer will reject as jurors all firm believers in Spiritualism. This is a prejudice for which there is no warrant in law: and should be frowned down by all lovers of justice. Why not exclude Catholics? There would be just as much cause for it. Civil and religious liberty is getting to be a farce in free America.

THY NEIGHBOR'S WIFE.

John F. Miller, of Osnaburg, Ohio, obtained judgment March 9, against John W. Montgomery for alienating the affections of Miller's wife. The parties are all prominent members of the Methodist church. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife," etc. I call the attention of Brother Henthorne, of the M. E. church, New Philadelphia, Ohio, to the fact that there are "free-lovers" in all the churches and people who live in glass-houses should not throw stones. The reverend gent. will understand.

COMPETITION.

In Youngstown, Ohio, the clergy and the justices are running opposition in the marrying business. Some of the ministers, it is alleged, made a deal with hackmen to pay them so much of the fee for every wedding couple delivered to them. It may be the "hard times" is responsible for this unhappy state of affairs, and preachers and laymen are pressed to make both ends meet.

Experience is by industry achieved, and perfected by the swift course of time.—Shakspeare.

CONSUMPTION

TO THE EDITOR: I have an absolute Cure for CONSUMPTION and all Bronchial, Throat and Lung Troubles, and all conditions of Wasting Away. WOMAN PLEADS FOR WOMAN—LORD'S DAY COMMITTEE—THE LION AND THE LAMB.

To the Editor:—By far the most attractive-looking public building in the goodly city of Santa Cruz is its new County Court-House. Built of a light-buff brick, with lighter trimmings, with large plate-glass windows, it is sunny, cheerful and inviting. Thither I went to hear a woman lawyer of Santa Cruz plead in Superior Court, the cause of a woman in divorce. The interior of the building was not disappointing. Tiled halls and white marble staircases lead us to the Courtroom. The wood finish, desks, chairs and tables in the whole building are of the various handsome native wood, and nothing could be more beautiful. The Courtroom had such a different aspect and atmosphere from the ill-odored ones in our large Eastern cities, that my first thought was: "surely some one has blundered,' and I am in a quiet, well-ventilated lecture-room!"

When the Court is seated, I have no longer room for doubt. A side door opens, and a large, well-formed woman, erect and stately, her face illumined with consciousness of power, and nobility of purpose, takes her place beside her client, at the table with the male lawyers, and I know this is Mrs. McCann and that a rare treat is in store.

I had been told that Mrs. McCann was an avowed Spiritualist, and that her lectures on that subject had met with fine acceptance by her audiences, but had not heard her until now. She has great dignity and force of character, and these are tempered and hallowed by rare womanly tenderness and intuition. Her strong, handsomely-formed physical body seemed full of reserve power, and amply able to sustain any mental effort of the shapely, well-balanced head, so nobly poised above it.

Her argument proved her a thorough mistress of her profession, by reason of her familiarity with the points of law, behind whose bulwarks she entrenched herself, while she enunciated with great clearness her profound convictions of equity and justice. Her voice is clear and resonant, her manner faultless, and I trust and believe she will yet be heard upon the floor of Congress.

Mrs. McCann had the advantage of living in a home atmosphere of law, her father having been a judge, and her husband having occupied the judge's chair in Santa Cruz for several years. It was not until after her husband passed to spirit life that she settled down to study with the purpose of making law her life profession. She passed triumphantly through a searching examination in San Francisco, and was admitted to the bar, since when she has been successful in her office work, here, but has never pleaded a case in public, until the time of which I write.

Heaven speed the day when every woman who is compelled to seek legal redress for the wrongs she suffers shall have to plead her cause as able and erudite a woman attorney, as is Mrs. Judge McCann.

The demand for mediumistic and progressive lawyers is likely to be pressing in the next few years, and especially for women lawyers, for church oligarchy, in support of a religion she did not foist upon the world, and which has always made of her a slave, is every hour attacking more and more defiantly the few rights of liberty of conscience we had thought could not be taken from us.

More than thirty years ago spirits prophesied through a Western New York medium that in the final struggle in this country to maintain inviolate the rights of the individual conscience against the usurpations of the creedal tyrants, but two great hosts would stand against each other; that the conservative Protestants could join hands with the Catholics, while the liberal and progressive element in every church would coalesce with Spiritualists, Agnostics and Freethinkers. I send a few straws gleaned from "The Endeavorer," of San Francisco, March 1st, and ask if they do not plainly show a strong wind blowing in the direction indicated in the first part of that prophecy. In an appeal from the of the "Sabbath Observance Campaign," I find this paragraph. "The Sunday mail work has been wholly discontinued in Mount Vernon, New York, a city of 17,000 inhabitants, and what was done there can be done in many places in this State. Cardinal Gibbons has asked Congress to stop all Sabbath work in the mails, and wherever else it has jurisdiction, and so Roman Catholics may be expected to co-operate." And the writer congratulates himself that this point toward securing all the Sunday laws the committee wishes, for once gained, the remaining struggle will be much more easily accomplished!

What the remainder of the struggle will be like, it is easy to foresee. Stop the Sunday newspapers, stop all travel on that day save in the direction of the church and pulpit, then stop all expression of conviction save what harmonizes with the blood-curdling superstitions the "Committee" shall choose to fulminate—these are a few of the beginnings of the tyrants' work to which we shall be treated, if we swerve one iota from a continuous demand for all the liberty we have enjoyed on what they so flippantly denominate the "Lord's Day."

Realizing to what extremes these fanatical sabbatizers may resort, if they once get a strong start, and in view of the preciousness of our present liberties, I can understand why I have so plainly heard my guides call Sunday the "Blasphemer's Day." That truly is the most flagrant blasphemy which calls one day of the week more holy than another, and does not recognize man's needs and liberties as unspeakably more precious, and needful to be considered, than any or all twenty-four hours of time.

THE LION AND THE LAMB.

Our March lion came blustering in, in most uproarious fashion; he shook snow from his strong mane upon the mountains, and sprinkled our streets with hail so that men and boys enjoyed a merry game of pelting in true snow-balling fashion. The flowers were not terrorized by all this furore, nor by the heavy winds and rains which followed; they went serenely on, blooming and filling the chilled air with delightful odors. The March Lamb followed quickly on the Lion's heels, and now they lie down in peaceful quietude together, seeming to have come to a definite agreement that lion should rule the night and lamb the day.

We sit close to a roaring wood fire in the morning and evening, and ride in open car in the middle of the day, pluming ourselves in the rich sunshine, and cheered by the roses that smile at us all along the way, and toss out their perfumed incense of delight in being, as we pass them by. If we drive out in the suburbs, we look down into the brilliant cups of that most luminous of flowers—the golden California poppy, and see great patches of the daintily-scented wild white forget-me-not!

I have wondered how we should know when spring came, in this wonderful country where the fields and such a great variety of trees are green all winter; but the line of demarkation has been unmistakably drawn by the flowering of the daffodils and buttercups, the almond, peach and apricot, and the leafing of the weeping willows. How wondrously beautiful they all are must be seen to be comprehended. I feel amply recompensed for a long life of waiting for such felicitious enjoyment.

X RAY GHOSTS IN PARIS.

WONDERFUL AND STARTLING DISPLAY—THRILLING STORY RELATED IN THE JOURNAL DES DEBATS.

In the Journal des Debats M. Henri de Parville gives an account of a recent spirit manifestation in Paris cleverly produced by X rays. "The spectators," said M. de Parville, "were ushered into a parlor in which there was an abundance of vases and artistic glassware. In a corner there was an apparatus about as big as an ordinary magic lantern enveloped in black stuff. The guests numbered about twenty.

"The lights were extinguished just as in the case of a regular spirit seance. A sort of rattling was heard, and immediately afterward a gigantic and luminous hand passed over the heads of the assistants. Evidently it almost touched some of them for we heard a little cry of terror that was quickly suppressed. 'Don't be afraid,' said the host, 'it is not the hand of a ghost; I will show it to you in the light by and by.' At the same moment a flock of luminous violins appeared and flew about in all directions. An old habitue of the boulevard remarked that we were with the Davenports. 'Not at all,' said the host, 'there never was a ghost in this house.' And the violins continued to dance over our heads. At last they disappeared as silently as they had come. Then an immense globe descended from the ceiling like a ball of phosphorus, oscillating like the pendulum of a clock. A luminous bell appeared in front of this globe and made regular bows to it. We could see its fiery tongue moving while the globe waltzed around.

"Suddenly at the four corners of the room the glasses appeared to become ignited; the vases were illumined and the lusters sparkled. A table loaded with cups and glasses was lighted up. Everything seemed on fire. The whole room, that was so dark an instant before, was aflame on all sides with phosphorescent light of a soft and bluish color.

"Then again all was darkness. Gradually a little light streamed in, and in a corner in front of a velvet portiere a human form appeared, at first vague and vaporous, hardly distinguishable. But soon its outlines became clear and it advanced. A lady beside me stepped back. Evidently she was not the only one, for we could hear the noise of moving chairs. The phantom advanced a few steps and then stopped. It was a tall woman. Her face had a greenish pallor; and what an extraordinary face it was. There were no eyes. We could only see two black holes under the eyelids. The mouth was closed; the hair was phosphorescent. A long, luminous veil enveloped this animated statue, and in the folds of the veil little sparks shone like diamonds. She raised her right arm slowly and tossed flames from her hand. There was no applause; all was hushed. The silent and severe apparition was watched with intense interest. A gong sounded. The apparition receded gently, and gradually faded out of sight.

"Once more there was a noise of moving chairs, and we distinctly heard a sigh of relief. In the center of the room an immense and luminous bouquet next appeared with a blue band, upon which was written 'X rays.'

"Then the lights were turned on, and the parlor appeared in all its splendor. The host arose. 'The seance is over,' he said. 'There was no spiritism about it, no occultism, nothing supernatural; it showed what X rays can do and that is all,,

"And now I can explain in substance that mysterious seance. It is well known that the Roentgen rays, invisible to our eyes, render fluorescent substances phospherescent, especially screens covered with cyanide of platinum. Recently a well-known maker of physical apparatus, M. Radiguet, found that under the action of X rays all objects in glass and crystal shine with peculiar briliancy, while everything else remains in complete obscurity. The machine that produces the rays is concealed behind several black cloths. Nobody can have any suspicion of its existence; but, nevertheless, the rays pass through all the cloths and light up all the glass objects, and nothing else, so that a glass held in the hand and moved up at will can be distincly seen, while the hand is absolutely invisible. But glass is not the only thing that becomes phosphorescent at a distance behind the X ray apparatus. The same effect is produced upon enamels, diamonds, porcelain, etc.

"When M. Radiguet made this discovery he, of course, immediately said that it could produce sensational tricks, excite the public curiosity, and create a new amusement destined to dethrone the ghosts.

"The operator in the present case had only two assistants. They were sufficient to handle the objects and display all the marvels. Their task was simple; they had only to move them carefully. The operators could not be seen, but the glass violins, vases, and the glass model of the hand were visible.

"So much for the glasses. Now for the phantom. A figurante, tall and clever, was concealed behind some drapery, and enveloped in a veil that was covered by a fluorescent substance. Her face was glazed with a phosphorescent sulphate of zinc powder. It is needless to say that the material could not be applied to the eyes, and that accounts for their absence in the livid face of the phantom."

Evidently X-ray ghosts are only in their infancy.

A STARTLING FACT.

DANGER SIGNALS!

SPIRITUALISTS, LIBERALS, FREETHINKERS AND SEVENTH DAY BAPTISTS AND ADVENTISTS MUST CONTINUE TO UNITE TO PROTECT THE LIBERTIES OF THE PEOPLE.

To the Editor:—I desire to call the attention of readers to the way the Physician and Parson Trust Companies are assisting to distress the poor and also assisting to produce hypocrites and liars. are too severe to receive the unqualified endorsement of judges who are progressive men. The following article I quote from Merck's Drug Report, March, 15, 1897:

DRUGGIST'S ARREST CRITICISED.

The New York County Medical Society is urged to make a real test case. Magistrate Cornell in Jefferson Market Court, New York, was evidently displeased on March 5, over an arrest of a druggist.

This man has done only what thousands of other druggists are doing every day, exclaimed the magistrate. He has not violated any law. If you want to make a test case, why don't you go into Hudnut's or Perry's or any other of the leading druggists, and get evidence against them. They will be able to make a fight that will settle the question. Why do you always select poor men? The case was that of Oscar Krause, a pharmacist, who has been doing business in Seventh Avenue for the last sixteen years. On the night of December 19, 1896, Clara Wittig, a detective in the employ of Agent Lurie, of the County Medical Society, pretended that she was ill and that the child she had with her was also ill. She begged him to prescribe for both, and he gave her a bottle of lime water and some simple prescriptions. One bottle contained a standard prescription for rheumatism sold by all druggists. On these prescriptions a warrant was obtained. He told the Magistrate how he had prescribed at the earnest solicitation of the detective, who claimed to be a poor woman suffering from various ailments and whose child was also ill.

If I had been a rich man and could put my prescriptions up in fine bottles and call them patent medicines, I could sell hundreds of bottles a day, and no one would interfere with me, but I am poor and cannot make any great display, cannot fight a case like this as it should be fought, and I am singled out for an attack, he exclaimed after he had finished his statement.

Magistrate Cornell coincided with the pharmacist and discharged him.

SUNDAY LAWS AND DRUGGISTS.

The people of this country most of them desire to have the drug stores open on Sunday. It is very handy in case of severe illness; even though you do not usually take much medicine. it is very convenient to have drug stores open on Sunday, but the battle always has been waged upon the druggist because he sells cigars and soda water, and the children will patronize him for candy and slyly expend the pennies intended for the dear heathen in India. It is all right to keep open for emergency cases. It is all right for the sale of postage stamps, and it is all right if the minister wants a horn of brandy to "inspire" him while he delivers himself of his Sunday sermon, but to sell cigars and soda and candy to the ungodly—oh! no, he must not do that. Its all right to have him in the store if the baby has the colic, and very convenient:

"She enters the drug store in a dignified way,
Quite full of importance and pride;
She looks quite impressive, as if to convey
The thought of an influence wide.
The clerks make a rush to attend to her wants,
Hand chairs for her comfort and ease,
But she cuts their hopes short when she says in advance,
'May I see the directory, please?' "

But to give the poor devil who puts in from ten to eighteen hours a day in the store a chance to make a dollar on Sunday, is a very wicked thing to do; and so the druggist on one side of the street is persecuted and prosecuted for endeavoring to earn enough to support his family, while parson who preaches in the church opposite, working there every Sunday (and some of them work hard) is well paid for his labors, and makes more money on the first day of the week, than the druggist can in the whole week, Sunday included.

When I was a boy, living home on the farm, I used to have to feed the pigs. There was always one real genuine pig in the lot. This one would not be satisfied with eating all he wanted but would usually exhibit his superior grade of hoggishness by stretching his full length in the trough. Many modern parsons make me think of the "critter" that so often used to disturb my usually even temper.

"The American Hebrew" says, there is "NO AUTHORITY FOR THE PURITAN SUNDAY.

Outside of England and America, no one—Protestants no more than Catholics—pretends that Sunday is the Sabbath commanded in the laws of Moses. The Spanish, Portuguese, Italian and all Slavonic-languages have for Saturday a name derived from 'Sabbath'—such are Sabado, Sabbato, Sobota—and the French Samedi and German Samstag are drawn from the same root. The very Sabbatarians of England and America call Sunday the first day of the week, in the same breath in which they quote the fourth commandment in Exodus 20, for the sanctity of the seventh day. Moreover, the day there commanded must in its very nature begin with sunset, for a man is enjoined to remember it, to keep it holy, in plain English to greet its advent, and that can hardly be done with the Sunday-Sabbath which begins at twelve o'clock at night, when most good Christians are asleep."

TOBACCO A DRUG.

Tobacco has been considered almost from time immemorial a drug and was used formerly in plasters, etc., quite extensively. The Sunday laws dictated by the parsons give the druggists the right to keep open on the first day of the week for the sale of drugs. A person desiring a cigar in a locality where such laws are enforced, can ask for cigars. The druggist will give him a wink and say: "Do you wish them for medicinal use?" And the man will laughingly reply, "Yes, I do." The druggist will then hand to him a small wrapper containing three cigars labelled "R." "For medicinal purposes." "One after each meal." "More often if required." Interesting isn't it? but the druggist thus euchres the parson and the Sunday law promoter.

The American Sentinel truthfully says:

"A Sunday law is a tax upon the people compelling all to contribute one day's time each week for the maintenance of a church dogma. Our forefathers went to war with Great Britain rather than accede to a tax far less grievous than this.

"The Church is now seeking political power, but political power is not the power of God. In a sense, all power is of God; but the power of God in His Church must be manifested in godliness. To be seeking for political power is a denial of the power of godliness.

"When the Church intermeddles in the affairs of the State, she forfeits the right of protest if the State intermeddles in the affairs of the Church."

A LARGE SIZED COLORED GENTLEMAN IN THE BIG WOODPILE.

Finally, brethren and sisters, I desire to call your attention to an article that proves for whom Protestant monkeys are pulling chesnuts out of the fire. The following dispatch which was sent out from Ottawa by the Canadian authorities, March 9, should be set over against the claim made in the Pope's latest encyclical, that it is a most grievous injustice to the papal church to represent that she interferes in the affairs of the State: "The government has decided to withold issuing the writ for an election in Champlain County, Quebec, until Parliment meets, when it will be announced to the House that owing to the attitude of the Roman Catholic bishops it would be impossible to hold a free election. Parliament will be asked to amend the criminal code to make it a criminal offense to exercise spiritual intimidation or influence in elections."

FRANCIS BAILY WOODBURY.

FARMER RILEY.

SEANCES AT MONROE, WISCONSIN.

To the Editor:—Farmer Riley and wife arrived in our city Friday evening, February 12th, and remained with us until Wednesday the 24th. Within that time he was busy giving seances that were very satisfactory to the sitters, among whom were Methodists, Universalists, Disciples, Presbyterians, Catholics and Spiritualists, the latter being in the minority.

One of the materializations was a fine-looking gentleman, husband of one of the number, (an orthodox Christian lady). He first wrote a communication, next materialized, pointing with his forefinger at his wife, and then disappeared, only to return stronger, and held his hand toward her in a way she hastened to him, and felt his strong pressure of her hand, and feels sure that had she been less timid he would have been able to embrace her. There came out a gentleman who was well-known to most of the people sitting in the seance, and they in chorus called his name, proving that all saw the same person. Later the same spirit came again and shook hands with one of his friends. This time he was stronger than at the first appearance, proving that a generous reception of a spirit helps it to a more perfect and stronger condition while manifesting.

There was one demonstration that seems more wonderful, if possible, than others to me. The mayor of our city and his good wife extended an invitation to a few of their friends to meet Mr. and Mrs. Riley at an eight o'clock tea. After we had partaken of the very elegant refreshments, we thought to have a seance. There being a bedroom off from the parlor, we decided to sit in the parlor and have Mr. Riley sit in the bedroom. There being a large square opening in the place of doors, this opening was closed by heavy curtains. The light was turned down, not so low but every object in the room was perfectly visible to us all. After singing some time, Dr. C., one of Mr. Riley's control's, came and requested me to sit with my back at the opening of the curtains and he would treat my ears (I being deaf). I did so and he gave me a thorough magnetic treatment, which made my ears and throat ache all that night and the next day, and I have had quite strange sensations at times in my throat and ears ever since the treatment. I cannot say that I hear better yet, but I do believe if I could have more of those treatments I might yet hear. Every person present will testify to this taking place just as I have related the occurrence, and any person who may read this article can address me and I will give the names of all present and they may write and find out for themselves the truths I have stated from the other parties present.

I will relate one other materialization; it was the form of a lady long since in spirit life, one that none of the people at the seance could in any way hold in mind, because of never having associated with her. I had an acquaintance with her only through having brought assistance to her in extreme poverty, so I could have in no way held her in mind, for I was thinking of those who were near and dear to me, and hoping for their appearance to me. When this lady came, I of course recognized her, and she kept bowing her head for "yes," as long as her head was above the floor. I asked one of the sitters to describe that form, and received a very accurate description of what I saw, proving that it could in no possible way have been produced through the activities of mind. There are many demonstrations that I could relate, had I time and space to do so, that transpired during Mr. Riley's stay with us. All will unite with me in saying that materialization is no longer a belief, but a positive knowledge obtained through the mediumship of James Riley, the medium who has withstood the watchful and vigilant eyes of the fraud-hunters, without a stain of dishonesty attached to his wonderful power. Our city is stirred from its usual quiet into an excited condition. Men and women are discussing the phenomena, and friends of long-standing are inclined to believe one or the other a fool. We hope Farmer Riley and his good wife will visit us again in the near future.

"Living is an art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the arts."—THOMAS STARR KING.

This book gives an admirable course of study in ethics, and supplies a long-felt want of an ethical text-book especially adapted to the comprehension of children, as well as older persons whom it is wisely and appropriately designed to interest while teaching them valuable ethical lessons.

The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principles of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in children's lyceums. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. It is a most excellent book and should be widely circulated.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF "The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

MIRACLE, A CHILD OF IGNORANCE

A miracle is defined as "a sensible contrivement of, or deviation from, the known laws of nature, wrought, or held to be wrought, either by the immediate act, or by the permission and assistance of a supernatural being; a supernatural event." Coming to us from the Latin, its primal meaning was "something wonderful, anything which excites wonder, surprise, or astonishment; a marvel."

A rainbow first beheld in a mountainous region, to an Egyptian who had never seen falling rain before, and, hence, had never seen a bow in the clouds, produced by the refraction of light passing through the raindrops and reflected back to the eye, was a miracle, only to be accounted for through supernatural agency. The receding tides, leaving the sea-bed dry land, over which fugitives fled, who were wholly ignorant of the cause of the phenomenon, was ascribed to divine interference. The returning tide drowning pursuers, if told by a priest, would describe the event as the parting of the waters at his command, and its forming a wall on either side. A person carried away in a cyclone, to one ignorant of the law that wind is but air in motion, would readily infer he was carried away in a mystic chariot and was translated alive to heaven. A case of suspended animation, to the untutored, is an absolute death, and his restoration is a resurrection from the dead. The slightly changed position of a sun-dial would seem to turn the sun backward in its course, and be a stupendous miracle, induced by the special request of a very influential prophet, he telling the story. Chrisna, raising a mountain above him, and using it as an umbrella to protect himself and milk-maids from the falling rain, was a magnificent miracle, quite equal to the feeding of five thousand hungry persons with five loaves and two fishes, by Jesus, all of whom were well filled, while twelve baskets of fragments remained. But are not such miracles, if not wholly fictitious, the exaggerated narratives of parties who wished to magnify the deeds of their hero, each trying to excel his co-relator of events?

The early history of humanity abounds in miracles. They were common to all heroes, many of whom became gods at their death and were adored as such. These gods were frequently born of virgin mothers. As knowledge advanced earth-born gods decreased in number, and their wonder-doings were correspondingly dissipated.

The age of miracles, of prophecies, of virgin-born gods, of the infraction of natural laws by the interposition of those half-human gods, all ceased when science dawned. They will wholly disappear when "knowledge shall run to and fro as the waters cover the great deep."

Demoniacs, witchcraft and sorcery are twin sisters of miracles and prophecy, and the world will be the gainer when the last of the infernal brood shall join their formerly associated companions, who are already numbered with the dead past.

HERE'S A QUEER ONE.

The citizens of Alexis, Ill., are puzzling their brains over the unparalleled conduct of a well-to-do farmer, named Green, who recently came to a butcher in the village and asked him what loss he had sustained in goods stored in a barn that was burned several years ago. The loss was figured up and Green produced a wallet and paid the amount, stating that he was the man responsible for the fire. He next went to the former owner of the barn, told him the same story, and paid the loss in full. He then hunted up several other citizens whom he claimed to have defrauded and insisted upon remunerating them. It is alleged that Green recently joined the church. He says that he has been a very wicked man and wants to make reparation.—Ex.

Write that convert down a freak. It is questionable if one in ten thousand attempts to right the wrongs he has committed. Jesus is expected to forget the past in compensation for believing that he is the Christ.

TOO PRACTICAL.

Elsie has reached the age, her parents think, where she should be taught something of the rewards and punishments hereafter. The description of the angelic hosts especially interested her. An angel, she was told, is that part of us that lives forever, either in bliss for its goodness or in torment for its wickedness. The other day she saw a picture purporting to be that of an angel. After studying it carefully, she turned to her mother with:

"Mamma, angels don't have bodies like us?"

"No," was the answer.

"Or no flesh?"

"No."

"But they have wings?"

"Yes."

A profound pause; then she asked:

"What do they fasten the wings to?"—Ex.

TREMENDOUS LIES.

The St. James Gazette, London, knows how the sensational press manufacture news to delight the populace. Its contemporary, the Daily News, had a correspondent in Turkey, who seemed to know just what would please his English readers, and increase their anger of the hated Turks. So in one of his letters he gave a detailed account of an Armenian, a personal acquaintance, on whom the Moslems wreaked their vengeance.

Sherro was a young fellow of thirty, a giant in stature, some six and a half feet in height, educated in several languages, and rich withal. He was a relative of the head man of Gheleguzan, where he resided. Sherro found himself in a Moslem trap and resisted the Turkish soldiers, who overpowered him, pronounced him a rebel, and determined to make of him an example. Now verbatim, as it appeared in the Daily News:

He [Sherro] was bound to a post, on a hillock in the center of the camp, and there he was flayed alive from the neck down. He lived for nearly three days, and as the fat of his body oozed out and melted in the burning sun, he shone, said the soldiers, like a mirror. The muleteer [his informant] did not see this revolting atrocity performed, but he saw his wretched friend bound to his place of torment while he was still alive, and again when death had tardily released him."

To this the St. James Gazette remarks:

"How this witness gloats over this description, and yet it is all a fiction."

A British delegate was instructed to make special inquiries after this case. He reported at length the result of his investigations among Christians and Mohammedans, none of whom had ever heard of the occurrence or one resembling it. Finally he found Sherro alive and unharmed at Ghelieguzan. The fact that the victim was reported alive, destitute of a skin, for "nearly three days," and his fat frying from his body in the sun, should have been ample refutation of itself without an investigation.

A parallel atrocity was reported from Canea. Four Christians were roasted alive in an oven. The British Commission thoroughly investigated this horror, and like the tortured Sherro, the victims were found alive. The Daily News claimed its authority in the latter case was the Athens Times, a Grecian paper.

The Youth's Companion, a Christian publication, referring to the innumerable falsehoods sent to this country from Crete, to influence popular dislike of the Turks, well says:

"The Apostle Paul quoted from a Cretian writer to the effect that 'the Cretians are always liars.' The conflicting reports from Crete, in which not all the misstatements and exaggerations are chargeable to the Turks, suggests that the habit of prevarication survives in that island."

A PAST AND PRESENT EVIL.

One of the most humiliating facts the historian becomes acquainted with, is that law which exempted the clergy, in all the earlier ages, and down to quite recent times, from the ordinary penalties for legal transgression. They were relieved from public burdens, both as regards person and property, and were held not amenable to the secular courts in criminal prosecutions. Though guilty of crime, like other men, because of their near relation to God, and because they could read and write, their guilt was compounded, and they were given over to the ecclesiastical courts for trial and to receive church penalties.

Out of these Middle-Age customs in favor of ecclesiastics came the exemption of church property from taxation. The same reasons urged for the exclusion of the clergy from secular punishment were insisted on for escape from taxes. The church structure was the house of God; in it dwelt the holy spirit; and as the residence of a living being was protected by more severe penalties than those not thus inhabited—so God's house should receive special protection, and be relieved from the cost of such protection, because of the dignity and sacredness of the character dwelling there.

The Progressive Thinker insists it is quite time all these fictions of law were relegated to the ignorant past, when priestcraft bore full sway. The jurist decides that drunkenness does not excuse the commission of crime, but aggravates it; so an educated clergyman, like a lawyer, guilty of felony, ought to be punished more severely than the witless ignoramus who is guided only by his natural instincts. And the temple built for show, though dedicated to God, idle six days in the week, should bear a heavier burden of taxation than the modest home of the producer who is rearing a family for the upbuilding of a State.

BLUFF THE WINNING GAME.

Rev. James McLeod, D.D., in a late issue of the New York Observer, said:

"The preaching of pessimism is not the best way to fill the Lord's treasury."

The good Doctor of souls was alluding to Rev. Dr. Pierson's claim of the "withdrawing of the Holy Spirit" from the churches. The great object of the church seems to be to "fill the Lord's treasury," so the kind of preaching which will best accomplish that purpose will evidently meet the Doctor's approbation. As the Lord's treasury is the church, and when the church structure is completed, the next want is to pay the salary of the preacher, so the repletion of that treasury is a serious matter and great care must be employed over the character of the preaching to net the largest revenue. Though everything should appear "going to the demnition bow-wows" yet the preacher should keep up his optimism and bluff his parishioners, to insure the filling of the Lord's treasury.

THE TRUTH OF HISTORY.

Lamartine's Turkey, p. 216, says: "Orkhan, the Mohammedan conqueror of Nice, founded there the first hospitals to feed the poor by obligatory donations from the faithful. These hospitals, suggested by a prescription of Mahomet, which claimed a portion of the revenues of the rich for the indigent, were called Imarets. Orkhan himself, after the example of the prophet and the Khalifs, used to distribute soup to the poor of Nice."

Asoka founded hospitals for men and beasts 263 B. C. The first insane asylum was established by Christians in which to incarcerate monks crazed by religion.

And now the "first hospitals to feed the poor" are traced to the Mohammedans! Verily, the clergy should study history before crediting everything to Christianity.

A GOOD MOVE HANDICAPPED.

The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union has determined to make a vigorous onslaught upon prize-fights. Pugilism is a survival of the gladiatorial sports of the Roman age, a twin relic of dueling. It ought to be suppressed by the strong arm of law. We are always glad to see women laboring in any field of reform, and we always bid them good speed.

If the above-named organization will drop its sectarian title, so all true reformers can join it, it will accomplish a far greater good. The last national census showed that only one-third of the American people are justly labeled Christian. Two-thirds, then, of the population, many as ardently interested in general reforms as Christians, are barred out by an objectionable appellation. Suppose it was a Woman's Spiritual or Agnostic Temperance Union, no Christian woman could conscientiously join the movement. The old Washingtonians, the Sons and Daughters of Temperance, the Temple of Honor, the Brotherhood of Temperance Watchmen, etc., all excluded sectarianism in name and in fact from their organizations, and they accomplished for reform what no other organization has approached. The haters of slavery, of dueling, of prize-fighting, and of all the great social evils, are as numerous outside of the church as in it, and they should all be joined in the grand work of human redemption. But this can never be done under a partisan, or a sectarian name.

A PAGAN RULER.

A sea captain has written to the Clarion, a London paper, lauding Mutso Hito, the present emperor of Japan, a Buddhist, who in Christian parlance, is a "pagan." He says of the empire itself—we greatly condense:

"It is a country whose land is nationalized, where not private individuals, but the State is rich. Only thirty years ago Japan was under the rule of a feudal lord. The Mikado is the most wonderful man in the world. One may see him any day in Tokio taking a walk or drive like any other gentleman. He wants no homage; is a man in every sense of the word.

"In the rebellion of 1868, when he escaped from captivity, he made the peasant a man, and with an undisciplined force defeated the troops sent against him. Instead of cutting off the heads of those who had opposed him, he told them to go home and behave themselves. He disendowed the churches, and set up free schools and colleges all over the country. There are no taxes on the people, except rent. Their only nobility is that of merit."

And all this in a country where Buddhism is the national religion. What a wonderful field for thought is here opened to us!

TO DISCOURAGE SUICIDES.

A bill has been introduced into Congress prohibiting the transmission through the mails of any newspaper containing any picture of any suicide, or any details relating thereto beyond the simple statement of death, with name, date and place of such suicide. Such legislation will be in the public interest. There cannot be a doubt that self-murder has been stimulated by the frequently disgusting sensational details by the press of these heart-rending transactions. It is believed by many that murders are increased in number and brutality by the frequent harrowing recitals of such events; yet possibly, this evil may be offset by their aid in the arrest, conviction and punishment of the offenders.

WONDERFUL RUINS.

An unknown ruined city, covering a space larger than New York City, with two temples and two great pyramids, has just been discovered in the mountains in the State of Guerrero, Mexico, by William Niven, the well known mineralogist of New York. He has just returned from a ten weeks' trip into that country, and brought back more than 300 photographs of the ruins. So says a Mexico special.

A SEVERE TEST.

If religion means anything, it must mean absolute truthfulness.—James Hinton.

It follows that all who claim to have religion are not trustworthy.

A VOLUME OF REVIEW, IN A FEW WORDS.

To the Editor:—Permit me to offer a strong endorsement to a few of the many good things in the proud, stiff-backed Progressive Thinker of March 20, 1897.

Allie Lindsey Lynch speaks out concerning weak-kneed Spiritualists of orthodox leanings. With her I roundly protest against offering "invocations," church notions or religious dogma, God or redemption, on the occasion of our meetings. Spiritualists should have nothing to do with superstition of any kind.

I also want to send cheering words to Dr. P. S. George, of Nebraska. If I were there he should not "stand alone" in that grand contest and war, which almost wages itself. He makes a brave and needful push against the hypocritical doctors' plot.

It is an insult to the powers and normal behests of nature not to embrace and uphold her lessons and her healers. The old so-called regular school, healing art blackens the face of her escutcheon by every effort at trying to elbow nature's healers out of legitimate work and standing. It is a confession of their weakness to invoke the aid of legal enactment. If M. D's. can't stand on their own merits, they should fail, as the non-fit to survive. Put away narrowness, and affiliate with the true, the light and good.

I congratulate Mrs. Levi Wood on her hymn, with the proviso of a suggestion and a little more of the "transposed." I would have it:

"No cares like a wild deluge come,
No storms of sorrow fall,
For love and peace dwell in ev'ry home,
And Law is all in all."

Not God, a myth. Law we know.

In like manner I would amend a line in "Pope's Essay on Man," thus:

"The universe is one stupendous whole,
Whose body nature is, and Law the soul."

If it be insisted on that God should remain instead of law, then it should read "sole" instead of "soul." In that case the lines would finish as a foot-note or a foot-piece to the subject. At any rate it may inspire a kick over the matter. A. S. HUDSON, M. D.

WHERE'S MOTHER?

ALL OVER THE WORLD THE QUESTION "WHERE'S MOTHER" IS BEING ASKED—EVER PRESENT IN THE CHARACTERS OF HER CHILDREN—THOUGH OTHERS FORSAKE, GOD AND MOTHER MAY STILL BE DEPENDED UPON—MANY ARE WATCHING AT THE WINDOW OF HEAVEN—HEAVEN AND EARTH IN CONSTANT COMMUNION.

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage preached at the First Presbyterian Church on the subject "Where's Mother?" He chose for his text, Judges v:28: "The mother of Sisera looked out at a window." Mothers are slow to give up their boys—waiting at some window, it may be a window on earth, or at some window in heaven. All others may have cast you off. Your wife may seek divorce and have no more patience with you. Your father may disinherit you and say, 'Let him never again darken the door of our house.' But there are two persons who do not give you up—God and mother.

"How many disappointed mothers waiting at the window! Perhaps the panes of the window are not great glass plate, bevel-edged, and hovered over by exquisite lambrequin, but the window is made of small panes. I would say about six or eight of them, in summer wreathed with trailing vine, and in winter pictured by the Raphaels of the frost, a real country window. The mother sits there knitting, or busy with her needle on homely repairs, when she looks up, and sees coming across the bridge of the meadow brook a stranger, who dismounts in front of the window. He lifts and drops the heavy knocker of the farm house door. 'Come in,' is the response. He gives his name, and says, 'I have come on a sad errand.' 'There is nothing the matter of my son in the city, is there?' she asks. 'Yes,' he says, 'your son got into an unfortunate encounter with a young man in a liquor saloon last night, and is badly hurt. The fact is, he cannot get well. I hate to tell you all. I am sorry to say he is dead.' 'Dead!' she cries, as she totters back. 'Oh, my son! my son! my son! Would God I had died for thee!' That is the ending of all her cares, and anxieties, and good counsels for that boy. That is her pay for her self-sacrifices in his behalf. That is the bad news from the battle. So the tidings of derelict Christian sons travel to the windows of earth or the windows of heaven at which mothers sit.

THEIR EARTHLY WORK IS DONE.

"But," says some one, "are you not mistaken about my glorified mother hearing of my evil doings since she went away?" Says some one else: "Are you not mistaken about my glorified mother hearing of my self-sacrifice and moral bravery and struggle to do right?" No! Heaven and earth are in constant communication. There are trains running every five minutes—trains of immortals ascending and descending—spirits going from earth to heaven to live there. Spirits descending from heaven to earth to minister and help. They hear from us many times [every] day. Do they hear good news or bad news from this battle, this Sedan, this Thermopylæ, this Austerlitz, in which every one of us is fighting on the right side or the wrong side? Oh, God! whose I am, and whom I am trying to serve as a result of this sermon roll over on all mothers a new sense of their responsibility, and upon all children, whether still at home or out on the tremendous Esdraelon of mid-life or old age, the fact that their victories or defeats sound clear out, clear up to the windows of sympathetic maternity. Oh, is not this the minute when the cloud of blessings, filled with the exhaled tears of anxious mothers, shall burst in showers of mercy on this audience!

"There at home sits the old Christian mother, ripe for heaven. She has done her work and done it well. No child or want ever came to her door and was turned empty away. No one in sorrow came to her but was comforted. No one asked her the way to be saved, but she pointed him to the cross. When the angel of life came to a neighbor's dwelling she was there to rejoice at the incarnation of an immortal spirit. When the angel of death came to a neighbor's dwelling she was there to robe the departed for the burial. Her eyesight is almost gone, but the splendors of the celestial city kindle up her vision. The gray light of heaven's morn has struck through the gray locks which are folded back over the wrinkled temples. She stoops much now under the burden of care she used to carry for her children.

WILL ASK THE QUESTION AGAIN.

"She sits at home, too old to find her way to the house of God; but while she sits there, all the past comes back, and the children that forty years ago tripped around her arm-chair with their griefs and joys and sorrows—those children are gone now, some caught up into a better realm, where they shall never die, and others out in the broad world, testing the excellency of a Christian mother's discipline. Her last days are full of peace, and calmer and sweeter will her spirit become, until the gates of life shall lift and let the worn-out pilgrim into eternal springtide and youth, where the limbs never ache, and the eyes never grow dim, and the staff of the exhausted and decrepit pilgrim shall become the palm of the immortal athlete!

PROF. CHARLES DAWBARN.

Did you read his article on the second page of The Progressive Thinker last week? Several have already said that it alone is worth more than a year's subscription to the paper. Read it carefully; then re-read it several times, and contemplate the statements made. There is enough genuine thought in that article to afford food for the mind for at least one month.

A NEW DEPARTURE.

PROCLAMATION OF PURPOSE—PRELIMINARY STATEMENTS.

Yesterday, March 21st, I was 79 years old; and as my eyes opened to the light this morning, on the commencement of my eightieth year, what I have been waiting for, some two years, flashed as clearly on my mental sight as did the golden sunshine on my outer vision.

Three years ago, last November, I was prostrated with la grippe, and for ten long months was unable to sit up all day. During that time it was revealed to me how the spiritual movement was planned in the Highest Circle of the Spirit Life, and also the manner in which that Circle was operating upon the people of Earth. It was also shown me that a "New Departure" on the part of Spiritualists was indispensably necessary. As soon as I was able to write, I prepared several papers on that topic and published them in the Light of Truth. From letters to myself and advices from the manager of that paper, I learned that a profound impression was made on the earnest thinking minds in our ranks in the direction of a more pronounced ethical culture among us as a people.

But for nearly two years, I have been waiting, most unwillingly, not being able to see what next was needed to be done to further the great purpose of the "Circle of the Higher Harmonies." And with the exception of writing one small book on Mediumship, I have done only fugitive work. Utterly unexpected, on this bright morning, under the cloudless sky of California, and the opening morning of my life's best work, I begin my eightieth year in penning this PROCLAMATION OF THE PURPOSES OF SPIRITUALISM.

In the realm of mind there is no chance work—no accidental happenings. Mind plans, and works to carry out those plans. The higher life is emphatically a world of mind, hence, of purpose or intention. Spiritualism is the projection of that intent into actualization on the plane of earthly existence. And hence, there should be as full and distinct proclamation of that purpose on our plane of being and action as exists on the higher. And, until it is made and Spiritualist men and women range themselves under the true banner, and align themselves in working harmony therewith, Spiritualism will present no potent front to the falsities and sufferings of deceived humanity.

THE PROCLAMATION.

Spiritualism demonstrates and affirms the Brotherhood of Humanity. No other religion has done this. Brotherhood means man's equality of rights and privileges; and hence, denies all special advantages to any; according equal liberty to all. But, as all present forms of government are so administered as to produce and foster inequality among men, there is no liberty for man except what he casually secures. Spiritualism, therefore, proclaims its purpose to be the reconstruction of all governments—the abolition of all forms of inequality and despotism, and the establishment of a perfect democracy. Democracy is now only a name, not a reality. There is no "government of the people, by the people, and for the people on this earth at present.

The nearest approach thereto is in Switzerland. Spiritualism purposes to inaugurate such a government, and to completely revolutionize the social customs of exclusiveness, jealousy, contention and unbrotherly hate so rampant at the present time. And it hereby issues its proclamation of purpose to inaugurate a New Government—a New Social order—in short a new life on earth for the Brotherhood of Humanity.

EXPLANATORY.

This purpose is to be accomplished by the education of the people into a comprehension of the principles of brotherly kindness and justice, and, the gradual transformation of laws and customs into harmony with the wisdom of love. It proposes the transformation of the spiritual movement from a jealous, wrangling, disjointed mass of selfish individualism into a united, altruistic propaganda for the education and uplifting of the oppressed and sorrowing multitudes of our suffering brethren. It proposes an end to the utterance and printing of shallow common places and wornout platitudes, and the substitution of "thoughts that breathe and words that burn." It recognizes that "these are the times which try men's souls," and it proposes that the death grapple with the powers of despotism be now made and the victory won. Now or never is the time.

This proclamation is not intended to specify particular forms of action. This will be done by the Brotherhood in due season. But it is intended as a Toesin of alarm; and whoever has ears to hear is requested to forward his or her name to the writer so that steps may be taken for unitary work. It is not looking to any outward organization, or to rival or supersede others; but, one of love and wisdom—one which unites head and heart—the natural union of souls that think and feel alike. Hence, it will be the leaven to transform all external associations into its own image. Its work will be to induce such perception of principle, and such benevolence of feeling that society will be revolutionized of its own impulse instead of any forcible imposition from without. TO REFORM MANKIND.

COL. INGERSOLL'S VIEW OF MAN'S IDEAL HAPPINESS — NATURE HIS ONLY TEACHER—A BROAD DISCUSSION OF THE STUDY AND PRACTICE OF MATERIAL PHILOSOPHY—SOME CAUSTIC CRITICISMS OF THE INEFFICACY OF THE CHRISTIAN CREED.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, not a moment older and not a whit less aggressive than many years ago, delivered, perhaps, his ablest special plea against the Christian religion here before a very large audience at the New National Theater, says the Washington Daily Times. It could be anticipated that there would be in a attendance more than 50 per cent of womankind, inasmuch as the prose-poet was to talk on "HOW TO REFORM MANKIND."

There was, as usual, a great deal of applause for the fine phrases of his oratory, but the biggest wave that swept over the house was when he referred to "the crusade" of the preachers against the newsboys, for the reason, as he put it, that the latter were interfering with the "business" of the former.

Col. Ingersoll spoke from two correlated themes, "There is no darkness but ignorance," and his own converse, "Intelligence is the only light." His whole argument was contained in the assertion that if the human race was to improve it could only be through the development of the brain. Every human being he assumed to be a necessary product and every one of them had some defect with the exception, perhaps of orthodox ministers of the gospel, and every step in civilization widened the horizon of man. The savage was influenced by appearances and passion, and therefore he sought the aid of the supernatural. The supernatural, however, is a myth, and nature is our only mother and teacher, although man has believed there was a master behind it, but he awoke and found that the remedies of life's ills were to be sought in nature herself, and even the pope, when he was sick, did not send for saints' bones, pewter virgins or little brass Christs, but for the doctor.

The age of miracles has departed for the good of humanity. Again, nobody would contend that all the popes, priests, parsons, or even exhorters, ever did, or ever would, succeed in praying down one drop of rain from the concave. The supernatural, too, had passed away as the foundation of government, and, here, government rested on the consent of the governed. As to the theories about morality, he held that whatever tended to the happiness of the race was moral and the reverse immoral. Proving the irresponsibility of man to the "Infinite Being," if there be such a thing, he said that the Infinite doesn't want anything, does nothing consequently, and therefore cannot affect us. All would be well as a beginning if man could understand that the universe is absolutely natural, and that prosperity is not the product of prayer. Col. Ingersoll then pitched into Jehovah in his old time way and abused Him for letting His enemies butcher His friends, the innocent to die on scaffolds, etc., as in former lectures.

Some of the lecturer's suggestions as to how to reform mankind were first to avoid waste, as in the money employed in keeping up standing armies with which "Christians intended to kill other gentlemen for whom Christ died," and following up this idea, he stood for all kinds of arbitration, and especially an international court, which alone should have an army and navy to enforce its just decrees.

Another waste was the money invested in churches, inasmuch as crime had not decreased at home, while millions were sent abroad to convert the heathen. He suggested a model church, in which some "gentleman of genius," not "called," should talk every Sunday on some subject that he knew something about, and that the building should be equipped with billiard and card rooms, libraries, etc., to make it interesting to the congregation. The Sunday school should also be a house of education, where people could learn something about Aeschylus, Socrates, sculpture and poetry, instead of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. The congregation of such a church, he thought, would be the most intelligent in the United States.

He would reform the penitentiaries. Men had failed to reform the world by punishment and death, for they would commit murder if the government did it. Society, he said, had the right to reform, but not to punish. He would have convicts paid for their work, and go out to the world with a change of name and sufficient money to face it without the certainty of going back again as convicts.

Another way to reform the world was to make the home beautiful and happy, as it was the unit of the nation. He hoped that the time for tenant homes would pass away and every man have a home. He would enlarge the operation of the homestead law, and he would make the sale of surplus lands compulsory on demand. He would have a "free wife, a free mother in every home" as the foundation of an ideal state of human happiness. He stood for divorce, to be granted to the man on proof of flagrant abuse of the marriage vows by the woman; but on the "request" of the wife, if she found living with her partner intolerable. He characterized a man as a beast who would insist on keeping a wife who despised him. All welcome children, he maintained, should be the result of mutual love, and there never would be a generation of great men until there was a generation of great and free women. One of the most beautiful of all the orator's flights was his eulogy of the word and idea of maternity.

Col. Ingersoll closed his suggestions by a discussion of the labor question, in which he scored employers who underpaid their servants and otherwise took advantage of their necessitous conditions. He believed that one day labor would unite and solve its own problems in a reasonable manner. The panacea for all the evils of mankind, he persisted to the end of his argument, was education, and always education. He paid his respects to society, "which knelt at the feet of wealth," and the hypocrisy of ill-accumulated riches, which sought to compromise with its conscience by endowing churches and universities instead of returning it in part to those by whom it was really made. In conclusion, he held that his suggestions were the real religion, the real music of life. It might not be realized in a few years or a thousand, but he believed it would eventually be the means of reforming mankind.

GOD, CREATION, LIFE.

A PHILOSOPHIC DISQUISITION ON A DEEP SUBJECT.

It is generally conceded that space is boundless; that the furthest stretch of the imagination reaches no nearer to the outer limits of space, but that it extends on and on, without center or circumference. May not the planetary system be equally extensive and without bounds? We look upon the blue vault of the heavens bedecked with luminous points called stars, without any conception of their magnitude or distance. The para in this State (Texas) is the unit of land measure but in great distances, to simplify we use the mile as the unit of measure. Now the distance from the earth to the sun is about 93 million miles; take this immense distance as a unit of measure and multiply it by hundreds of millions and we have not yet reached some of the remote but visible stars. Some are so distant that it requires ages for their rays of light to reach us. And if they were instantly blotted out, future generations might witness the phenomena, but we would not.

Rays of light, like sound, require time to pass from one point to another. At a certain distance from a cannon when fired, you see the smoke and in ten seconds you hear the sound; double the distance and you double the time. Just so with sight. The rays of light coming from one of these distant stars require years to reach us; and could we be instantly transported to one of these stars, and could look back to earth clearly, we would see ourselves in infancy and watch every act of our lives up to the time we made our exit.

If the rays of light require forty years to pass from the earth to the planet from which we take our observation; then we would have to remain there forty years before the last act of our lives would reach us—unless, like the clairvoyant, we could annihilate time and space, and bring the whole scene in a grand panoramic view before us. What would we be looking at? not at ourselves but a reflection or photographic picture thrown out on the ether waves—and I will here parenthetically remark that these impressions may be what clairvoyants see and are thus enabled to read our past.

We have been contemplating a vast universe, worlds and systems of worlds, without limit or bounds. Whence this mighty structure. When was the universe created, and who is the architect? I hold that nothing was ever created, nor will anything ever be annihilated; that force and matter are as eternal as space is boundless; that there is neither more nor less matter or force to-day than at any other time in the past. Every planet like our world has had a beginning, and everyone must have an ending. While one dies, another is being born.

Ages before our world was conceived by the forces attracting the first molecules of matter as a nucleus for a world, other planets had grown hoary with age and were slowly disintegrating and returning to their original elements. And for aught we know, our sister planet, the moon, has lost or is losing her vital forces, and the molecules of matter are floating away to be gathered up by other planets, or forming with molecules of distant, decaying planets, the nucleus of a new planet which in the course of ages will become one of the first magnitude.

It requires no greater stretch of the imagination to conceive of force and matter being eternal, than to recognize an eternal God, that created force and matter. An eternal and unchangeable God carries with it the idea of an eternal and unchangeable code or system of laws. Hence worlds have been forming as far back as God has been unchangeable.

If there was ever a time before God invested in the enterprise of world-building, and had he continued unchangeable in that line of policy which he had followed through remote ages, we would not to-day have a universe for man to speculate upon. The various forces acting upon the molecules of matter would likely produce an effervescence resulting in chemical combinations and gathering matter in spherical forms.

It is not sufficient to presume that matter and force are eternal. This is not a solution of the apparent design manifested in many organic forms. Dr. Paley and others have made strong arguments in favor of a creator, on the theory of design. Forces were discovered and named by observing the phenomena they produced. Among them may be mentioned electricity, magnetism, adhesion, cohesion, gravity, etc. By these blind forces in conjunction with matter, many wonderful, physical phenomena are produced. The earth is held intact by gravity. Heat and light are radiated, volcanic eruptions, earthquakes, electric storms, and the much dreaded cyclones, are all traceable to these forces.

Why do we conclude that there is such a force as electricity? For the reason, we witness its phenomena. What induces us to recognize the force called magnetism? We are confronted with the phenomena of one body being drawn or attracted to another, and we have so named this force. Now in as much as we witness the phenomena of life with all its conscious attributes, are we not justified in concluding that there is such a thing as conscious force the basic principle of life? To recognize this as one of Nature's universal forces, we would no longer seek for a designer separate and apart from Nature's laws, but would look upon the marks of design as traceable to this conscious force, as naturally as we trace the falling of a stone to the force of gravity, and perhaps with as little concern as we watch the needle turn to the magnetic pole. But let as not confound these forces. We would not charge the falling of a stone to magnetic attraction, nor the turning of the needle to the attraction of gravity. Neither should we charge the volcanic eruptions, the earthquakes and cyclones to the conscious or designing force, unless they carry with them the marks of design or consciousness.

Life is not of spontaneous production, but all life comes from antecedent life. Now to avoid confusion and to distinguish between blind, active forces and the conscious force, we will call the latter spirit. Then man possesses a conscious, immortal spirit which emanates from the great spirit that pervades the universe. Now if we can bring the vibrations of our little spirit organism in unison with the vibrations of the conscious force or spirit that pervades the universe, then telepathy, thought transference, and clairvoyancy becomes easy. THE DESTINY OF MAN.

THE RESPONSE OF SPIRITUALISM

Dr. H. V. Swerlingen's Response to a Toast Given to Him at the Banquet of the Commencement of the Fort Wayne College of Medicine, Tuesday, Evening, March 16, 1897.

Mr. Chairman, Fellow-Physicians, Ladies and Gentlemen:—Since I was informed a few days ago by my esteemed colleague, Dr. Gross, that I would be expected to respond to the last toast upon the programme of this banquet, and that its subject would be, viz.: "What Is the Ultimate Destiny of Man?" I have been endeavoring if possible, to ascertain the motive which actuated the committee in the selection of this subject, and of myself as the speaker upon it.

My impression is that the committee was of the opinion that by the time the end of the programme was reached, if the participants therein were capable of entertaining any sentiment at all, that sentiment would be, "O, give us a rest," and that my remarks would then have the effect of a prompt and efficient hypnotic.

However this may be, I do not lay the flattering unction to my soul that the committee desired to so arrange the intellectual part of the feast, that the best of it would be reserved for the last.

But seriously, has not the committee in the selection of the subject at least, simply represented the intense but yet quiet interest now manifested in it by the entire medical profession and the public generally, (an interest which is yet too much restrained by prejudice, ignorance, policy, conventional criticism and other environments), and chosen an individual to present it who had dared to enter into the forbidden paths of its investigation—dared to participate in the labors of a laboratory of inquiry into the mysterious?

But whatever may have been the motive of the committee in selecting the subject for our remarks, its action plainly suggests that if there is any information to be gained in regard to the ultimate destiny of the human race, the medical profession will stand second to no class of people in obtaining it.

The term "old school" is no longer applicable to the regular medical profession. While it is and ever shall remain loyal and orthodox to all old truth, it stands ready to give a hearty, orthodox reception to all new truth, well knowing that it cannot possibly antagonize the old, unless we should be mistaken in the old as being truth.

But the question is: What is the ultimate destiny of man? I may remark in passing that had I been allowed to choose my own subject for discussion, I would undoubtedly have selected something hard,' something difficult to handle; but of course, I must abide by the decision of the committee.

Until I began a personal investigation of this question, I was of the opinion that America was a land of "free thought, free speech, and free press," but I soon discovered that upon the question before us, at least, thought, speech and press were only "free" to give old orthodox expression.

"What is the ultimate destiny of man?" The generally accepted answer to this question is that either he will find his final avocation in walking the golden streets, wearing wings and golden crowns, playing golden harps, singing psalms and Solomon's songs and in doing all such things as we can readily imagine our esteemed confreres, Doctors Myers and Wheelock, would indulge in when they "get there"—or that he will participate in an ever-to-be-continued bath of melted brimstone under direct supervision of a fellow creature who rivals his Creator in power and influence.

However difficult it would seem to credit the latter destiny, it no doubt accounts for the animated discussion which occurred recently between our worthy colleagues, Doctors C. B. Stemen and Maurice Rosenthal, upon the merits of asbestos as a bathing-suit material.

You ask me 'What is the ultimate destiny of man?" In all becoming humility, I answer: I don't know. Nor does any man know. That word ultimate renders your question unanswerable. If eternal progression be true, there will be no "ultimate." It is my opinion, however, that the committee intended to ask: "What is the ultimate destiny of man's present existence? or does death end all?"

That what is called "death" is the ultimatum of man's present existence, requires no argument to substantiate. It is universally accepted as true. But whether or not his existence ends with death is a question upon which even Bishop Foster has expressed his ignorance. It is therefore absolutely necessary that some knowledge be acquired to satisfy the craving intellectual hunger upon this great question. I assert most positively that some knowledge has been acquired upon it, and that I have shared in the acquisition of that knowledge to such an extent as to enable me to declare most emphatically, that death does not end all. This is not the time or place to give you that knowledge. Suffice that knowledge is based upon evidence which appeals to my natural senses for the proof of its reality. I may be damned for believing my senses, but I'll be damned if I can help it.

Death is a delusion. It is the most collossal scarecrow of the ages. It is our warmest friend in the disguise of a most malicious enemy, of the "king of terrors," of a "grim monster." I have no more fear of death than I have of going to sleep. I have in common with humanity a natural fear and dread of physical pain and suffering which often precedes death, but for the articulo mortis or death itself, I have no dread whatever. This is something I could not have said a few years ago, and is the result of what investigation I have been able to make of the subject. With Bryant I can now sing:

"Beside the massive gateway, built up in years gone by,
Upon whose top the clouds of eternal shadows lie,
While streams the evening sunshine on quiet wood and lea,
I stand and calmly wait until the hinges turn for me.
"I mark the joy, the terrors; yet these within my heart,
Can neither wake the dread nor the longing to depart;
And in the sunshine streaming o'er quiet wood and lea,
I stand and calmly wait until the hinges turn for me."

Heretofore, between the spiritual and material realms the gate had not been left even "ajar" and "faith" and "hope" were our only consolation. But now the knowledge of a future existence is reaching the man of science in his laboratory or study, and he is ready for the demonstration of immortality.

It has walked into the churches of all denominations, religious and tongues; has stood beside the clergyman or priest or ministrant, and has whispered the message of immortal life.

It is proving itself a solvent of all religious and philosophies by correcting erroneous ideas born of imperfect human interpretations concerning a future life.

It has made thousands and hundreds of thousands to acknowledge it by name, within and without the churches, within and without established schools of philosophy, within and without the walks of science, and thousands of others to accept its evidence in the form of belief based upon the testimony of others.

Its sources of inspiration are the invisible hosts.

Its teachers and messengers are the great, the wise, and the loved ones who have passed on.

It has opened a royal or inner way to knowledge for many who are its chosen instruments, by touching child minds with facts and data, with scientific and philosophical knowledge, with wisdom far beyond their years, and with eloquence unknown to mortal art.

It not only has created a literature of its own, in hundreds of volumes of experience and philosophy, and scores of periodicals publishing its demonstrations and advocating its propositions, but it has pervaded the best literature of the age, touching and illumining the minds of such writers as Dickens, Longfellow, Thackery, Bryant, and scores of others with its living presence.

Its uplifting influence is felt in every life that accepts it, and in the whole world by making the aims of life here consistent with a life beyond.

It has bridged the chasm, spanned the gulf between the two states of existence by the iris archway of love.

It is establishing the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

Immortal messengers have brought the knowledge of their state of existence and have announced in unmistakable ways the nearness of that so-called undiscovered country.

Invisible hands have re-kindled the fires upon the altars of inspiration that had long been desolate.

Angels and ministering spirits have anew attuned the voices of mortal to immortal songs, and they have rolled away the stone from the door of the sepulcher of thousands of human hearts who thought their dead lived not.

Its authority is truth wherever found; Its sacred books the inspirations of every age.

Its oracles and priests, those whom truth anoints and inspiration calls; its creed the unwritten law of knowledge, wisdom, truth and love;

Its ceremonials the service of a noble life;

Its communion is with kindred spirits and its fellowship with all.

Its altars the human spirit; its temples living souls.

It is the open door, the present light, the demonstration, philosophy and religion of the immortal soul.

Calm-browed and unafraid this mild-eyed, open-visioned Presence views the heretofore and the hereafter, the present and the future, with equal interest and courage born of perfect truth.

The well-springs of eternal life are hers, and she bids mortals drink fearlessly at their living fountains.

The "bread of life" is hers, and she bids all souls partake freely from the all-bounteous store.

From the vintage of the spirit the wine of her everlasting kingdom is distilled in streams of living inspiration.

Poets quaff as this golden goblet is pressed to their lips and sing the songs of the spheres.

Sages gather from its open treasure-house the wisdom of the skies.

Seers and prophets, inspired anew, reveal again the forever old, forever new, immortal theme.

The mourner forgets her grief and dries her eyes while listening to the messages of love.

The weary find rest in its all-reposeful and eternal ways.

The weak find strength in its unhindered helpfulness.

Crime, sin, and all human imperfections and shadows fade gradually yet surely before its all potent light.

The whole world touched, awakened, thrilled, aroused from the lethargy of material propositions and dogmatic assertions, from charnel houses of the senses, the tombs of death and despair, from sepulchers wherein their hope and faith and highest love were well-nigh buried, turns toward this new day-dawn saying, "Is not this the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world?"

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

If will is force, and thoughts are things, thoughts must be made up of thought individualities; as all things congealed are aggregations of units, visible or unvisible; these individualities of thought substance must sustain the same relationship to us, as our individuality relates to God's higher personality of mind as a whole. That is thought, or magnetism, made up of units or atoms of mind, without destroying the one personality of mind as the originator, of thought force, or will.

Thoughts are things! and each particle of that thought substance, atoms of thought, which are our thought children; shaped in impressions by the form of thoughts we may express. Let our thoughts be good thoughts then, that we may witness the harvest of growth, in after life, with impressions our mind has made upon them, with tendencies of growth toward goodness and beauty.

Every re-incarnation of the atoms in physical forms adds to them mental impressions that designates their after life tendencies of mental growth, when their individuality takes on larger personal form, and a physical body of their own. Every atom has a central force within it moving in love towards some atoms and hate for others by moving away from them, must possess an atom of mind, as love and hate are mind attributes.

If all worlds and solar systems in this universe are revolving around some central force of love and attraction, then all things must be governed by the law of love. And as love is a mind power, thus all things are moved by God's Omnipotent mind of love, as a dominant force and we but atoms of Its infinite mind.

MELIORISM.

OPTIMISM REPUDIATED—PESSIMISM REFUTED—SOCIOCRACY THE GREAT SALVATION.

An exposition of Pessimism by W. H. Burr appeared in The Progressive Thinker about a yearago. He remarked that the word was not found in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary. Neither is the word Meliorism. And the latter, as a distinctive philosophy, is still more recent than Pessimism. The word Meliorism seems to have been first used by George Eliot, who was neither an optimist nor a Pessimist. She held to the middle term which she invented, and called herself a Meliorist.

Professor Lester F. Ward, of Washington, D. C., whom I am inclined to rank above Herbert Spencer, in his "Dynamic Sociology" 1883, now a text book for post graduates in several universities, defines Meliorism as "humanitarianism minus all sentiment." And in his later work, "The Psychic Factors of Civilization," 1893, he says:

"The philosophy that stands opposed to Pessimism and must ultimately triumph over it is not Optimism, which is the gospel of inaction, but Meliorism, which is scientific utilitarianism, inspired by faith in the law of causation and the efficacy of well directed action."

Happiness he defines as "a condition of continuous or constantly recurring pleasures, of whatever class, predominating largely over pains." He further says:

"Pain in and of itself is evil—the only evil. Yet viewed in the dry light of science it is good if there is any good, for it is the sole guaranty of life itself. This, then, is the origin of evil, and forever closes the great debate, while at the same time it furnishes the ultimate answer to Pessimism, asceticism, orientalism, and all the isms that bewail the sufferings of the world."

I quote further:

"Great thinkers are condemned not for their theorems, but for their corollaries, and further analysis often proves that the latter do not logically flow from the former. It was so with Hume, so with Voltaire, so with Comte, so with Thomas Paine, and it was so with Schopenhauer. The two great philosophical heresies of Schopenhauer were his Idealism and his Pessimism. Both these he believed to follow from his two basic conceptions, his Satz vom Grunde (Law of causation) and his Wille (will) The former was the first philosophical establishment of the law of causation in nature, now recognized as the foundation of all science. The latter was the first enunciation of the unity of psychic and physical force, the highest and most involved example of the law of the conservation of energy, formulated much later by the Physicists. If as most persons believe, truth is really to 'prevail,' then, when Pessimism and Idealism shall have become historic curiosities, Schopenhauer will be universally recognized as the philosopher who created two epochs.

"With the first of these philosophic fundamentals we have here nothing to do. It belongs to Cosmology and has received universal acceptance. The second is the essence of our present theme, and is scarcely known, much less understood, even by those who devote themselves to philosophic psychology. It is the practice, whenever Schopenhauer's name is pronounced, to throw up the hands and exclaim, Pessimist! Those who read his books skim over everything else, till they reach his pessimism and hang spellbound over this alone. The more it is condemned the more greedily it is devoured. Yet those who denounce it most vehemently are those who have not read it."

The author proceeds to say that Schopenhauer's Wille is nothing more than desire—the universal soul-force which constitutes the only basis of the real science of mind—that it has nothing to do with the rational faculty, which is something extremely modern—that it is blind impulse, the dynamic basis of mind, and as much older than intellect proper as the Eocene period is older than the glacial epoch. In "Dynamic Sociology" he treats the Wille as a phantom, consigning it to the limbo of paradoxical myths, and sees no reason for clinging to what is shown to be only a will-o'the-wisp. And in his "Psychic Factors" he closes the chapter on Schopenhauer as follows:

"The pre-eminent service which Schopenhauer has rendered to philosophy has been that of turning the current of thought out of the old and hopeless channels of objective psychology into the new and promising channels of subjective psychology. Here and here alone, is there hope for the science of mind."

Professor Ward's refutation of Pessimism is briefly as follows:

Pessimism is the negation of pleasure. The satisfaction of a desire terminates it. Is the painful state called desire continuous up to the time when it ceases? To say it is not is to deny the existence of pleasure, relegate happiness to the limbo of delusions and make Pessimism the only true philosophy. The answer comes from psychometry. All psychic phenomena consume time. If the act of gratifying a desire were absolutely instantaneous there would be no answer to the Pessimist. Life would be a struggle with no reward but that of putting an end, one after another, from childhood to old age, to the intolerable scourges that successively beset us. No one is capable of balancing the profits and losses of life. The reality of pleasure and happiness must be proved by the senses, the highest criteria of truth, if simple sensation cannot be relied upon, there is no certainty anywhere. I put a lump of sugar on my tongue. I declare the sensation agreeable. Who can gainsay it? If I do not know it myself, then there is nothing I can claim to know. Now the pleasurable sensation is not instantaneous nor brief; it lasts as long as the sugar lasts, though diminishing in force from an apparent gradual exhaustion of the capacity of the nerve to respond to the stimulus. Now what is true of the lower senses is certainly true of the higher. The mental state is a continuous one, and in the higher emotions the duration of the pleasurable state is greater than in the lower ones. While in the primary physical form of satisfying love it is only momentary, in the secondary, spiritual form it seems to be indefinite in time, or so long as the object is present. And what is true of love is true of all other permanent pleasures and enjoyments. And this is the refutation of Pessimism. The despairing view that Schopenhauer and Hartmann take, borrowed from the philosophy of India, is based upon the supposed necessity of the existing woes of life. With them it is the Will perpetually driving its victims on toward some goal of relief which is never attained, or if attained in the sense of the pain being simply ended, another and a new scourge is applied, and so on indefinitely. Therefore they see no hope except in denying the Will, resisting its power, abandoning all hope of happiness, refusing every proffered good, and letting every function cease until relief at last comes through death and non-existence. Pessimism is the product of a hostile social state. Its answer is the substitution of a friendly social state. If this can be done it will disappear.

"Sociocracy" is the title of Professor Ward's last chapter. He controverts the laissez faire doctrine; he says that extreme individualism borders on practical anarchy and is highly favorable to the spread of Plutocracy. Many honest political economists are still lured by its specious claims. Herbert Spencer defends it to the most extreme length. It will require a titanic effort to dislodge it and rescue society from its rapacious jaws. But it need not require a revolution to substitute Sociocracy for Democracy. Government needs to be strengthened in its primary quality—the protection of society. Plutocracy, though not a form of government, is wielding as great a power as any government has ever wielded. Monopolies are taxing the consumer from 25 to 75 per cent of the real value of the goods. An excise tax to that amount on all products would justify a revolt. Society can escape this conquest of power by the egoistic intellect. It has supplanted autocracy by aristocracy and this by democracy. Most of the European monarchies are practical democracies. The individual has reigned long enough. He should not be denounced nor blamed. He should be praised and imitated. Society should imagine itself an individual and becoming conscious of its interests should pursue them with the same indomitable will with which the individual pursues his interests.

Already is there a movement to this end. For the first time in this country a distinctive industrial party has been formed. In the Forum for June, 1887, Prof. Ward pointed out as the true solution of the great social problem of the age, "the establishment of a genuine people's government, with ample power to protect society against all forms of injustice, coupled with a warm and dutiful regard for the true interests of each and all, the poor as well as the rich." Four years later the Populist party was organized at Cincinnati.

Ethics as a factor in civilization, is practically ignored by Prof. Ward. He is unable to see that Herbert Spencer has found a scientific basis for it, or that he means anything else than the old basis. What he says that is new in his "Principles of Ethics" is no part thereof. "As treated by him it is a partisan defense of individualism, amounting to practical anarchism." "It would probably be better for personal morality if ethics were only taught historically and philosophically."

COMMENT BY MR. BURR.

The above article in manuscript has been read by me, and I have but one criticism to make. Professor Ward says:

"No one is capable of balancing the profits and losses of life." Just so; and will anyone be better able to balance them when Socioeracy succeeds Democracy? Will the time ever come when the question can be decided whether man is happier in a civilized than in a savage state, or even happier than a clam?

DEMONOLOGY.

THE THEOLOGY OF THE "DARK AGES"—CHIMNEYS OF HELL—HOW THE DEVIL APPEARS TO MEN.

Scientists are aware of the survival in man and animals of certain parts that were once useful in their physiological make-up, but which by the process of evolution and as the result of changed conditions and environments have become inoperative and outgrown, and of no further use in the physical economy.

The same law holds good in the realm of theology, as is demonstrated by the fact that in this year 1897 there exists in Germany institutions approved by the state in which are taught doctrines that smack painfully of the dark ages. In the University of Munster, Westphalia, Prof. Lantz teaches theology in which the volcanoes of this earth are declared to be the chimneys of hell, and the devil is regarded as constantly propagating new living beings after his own kind on this globe; Prof. Leistle, rector of the Lyceum in Dillingen, Bavaria, teaches of the various forms in which the Devil still appears to men—in the shape of a goat, a fox, a wolf, lion, bear, dog, snake, etc.—and gives exact methods by which to recognize Satan below this outward cloak and how to exorcise him. This gentleman, Prof. Leistle, in fact, has just published a voluminous book on demonology, in which all those things are set forth in detail. A Jesuit father, Lehmkul, has written a theological work for the use of Catholic missionaries in Germany, in which he expressly maintains that the Devil holds intimate intercourse with men and women, and another Jesuit, Rosiguoli, in a book published at Paderborn, tells remarkable tales of the appearance of late years of Satan and his assistant devils and of the means of escaping his tricks and assaults. All these teachings and writings are indorsed by the bishops and declared to be sound theology.

During the Dark Ages this theology was generally taught and believed, but the progress of science and enlightenment has gradually dissipated such diabolic notions, except in such dark nooks as the University of Munster, with its iron-clad non-progressive professors.

This theology of the Dark Ages was formerly held to be Bible truth, to doubt which was "heresy" and "infidelity," and to criticise it was to assault the Bible itself.

Forced by the progress of science and ethical ideas, theologians have been compelled to abandon the old notions and adopt a new interpretation of Bible teachings. This has been the course of Bible theologians—when driven from one Bible fortress, they have executed a flank movement and taken up a new position, and defend themselves with new ammunition—a new interpretation of Bible meanings.

A noted Bibliolater quite recently asserted that the Bible has withstood the assaults of criticism.

Yes—and the way it has done it, has been by its theological defenders' transferring their position behind the ramparts of a new interpretation—and when driven from that, they will continue the same tactics.

In this manner the Bible will ever be able to withstand the attack of criticism.

HOME AND WORK.

PRAYER — INVOCATION — SILENT COMMUNION—HARMONY.

To the Editor:—I have in nowise forgotten you, nor the corps of workers engaged on your valuable paper, though I have been silent for a long time. I am as much interested in the Thinker as when we were neighbors and I was privileged to drop into your sanctum and learn by word of mouth of the progress of your work.

Mr. Hull and I have had a busy season, notwithstanding we have had the blessing of home comforts all winter. Our labors have been so near "The Hub," we have had the double advantage of home and plenty of hard work. With the exception of my recent trip to Philadelphia, our appointments during the season, have been within a few hours' ride of home.

I might have sent you items that would have been of interest to the cause in a general way, and reports of local work that would have been encouraging to those connected therewith, ere this, but I know the majority of readers who patronize the Spiritualist papers consider space taken by such reports can be used to better advantage, and knowing that you always have valuable articles "pigeon-holed waiting their turn," I do not like to introduce my communication too often.

I would like to say much in commendation of many of the contributions that grace the pages of the Thinker, but will not take the space or time here. I must however refer to the articles from the pen of Hudson Tuttle, on "Lyceum Lessons." He is supplying "a long-felt want" in the direction of Lyceum work, and I know his efforts must be appreciated. Every one of the contributions under this heading has been valuable and furnished much food for thought. He seems especially gifted in that line.

I was not a little interested, and somewhat amused over the communication from Professor A. B. Severance in reference to my "write up of the Baxter funeral." What a terrible thing it was for me to invoke the presence of our spirit friends—to express the earnest desire of my soul that we might be enabled to make "the best conditions" for the return of the lately arisen wife and mother, whose remains were surrounded by friends who were endeared to her during her pilgrimage among them.

Professor Severance, and Elvira L. Allen, (whose article endorsing Mr. Severance, "Sensible to the Last," appeared in a late issue,) are old-time friends of mine. They ought to know that among all their acquaintances there is no one who objects to "the whining cant of the church" more than myself. They know now, as well as they will after I have made the statement, that I have no faith in a personal God, nor do I invoke such a being. They know I have always urged that no Spiritualist should ever yield their individuality to any spirit and that I do not believe "in begging the dear spirits to come." I however believe in prayer, as I believe in breathing, eating and sleeping, because it is as natural. Montgomery defines prayer as "The desire of the heart, uttered or unexpressed." Among the definitions given by Webster, is this: "An entreaty, or earnest call." My critics object to "an entreaty, or an earnest call" in the presence of an assemblage, because it is "aping the church." One of them declares emphatically that it is a silly idea to call our spirit friends, because they will bless us whenever they can, and do as much for us without our pleading as they will when they are urged to come. This may be true; but who that has ever been blessed with a spiritual experience, whose soul does not sometimes go out silently, earnestly, entreatingly toward the dear ones who "are always willing to come?" They may not be affected by any words of ours, we know they are by our thoughts. In one sense, "Prayer may not avail among our Spirit Friends," but the outpouring of our aspirations affects us—makes us receptive to the inspiration of the higher powers. In other words, our earnest prayers open the doors of our souls, and puts us in a condition to receive the grander light.

There is another reason why invocation is sometimes desirable in an audience. In order to secure good results, it is highly important there should be harmony between the speaker and his listeners, that there should be a concentration of thought, a unity of purpose; sometimes the reading of a poem will produce the needful condition, at other times the expression of the uplifting thought of the lecturer or some one in the audience. There are some people who recommend "a few moments of silent communion," claiming that the expressing of an "entreaty" is a form resembling the church. If all who attend our meetings were united in thought, consequently in spirit, a few moments of so-called "silent prayer" might accomplish the result. But we know there are persons of all kinds of thinking in our audiences, and in many instances the chatter that is kept up in the hall until the moment the meeting is opened is bewildering, especially to a sensitive. There are persons who cannot "concentrate" their mental forces only as they are led by some other. A lady, whose business was that of trimming hats, once said to me, "I make up several designs of hats from those I see in the audience during the period of silent communion." I have frequently heard persons say: "I always think of everything I don't want to, when I try to concentrate my thought." Words are often necessary to lead the mind and as thought through words becomes united, a perfect rhythm is created in the atmosphere, and the result is harmony.

If my critics do not feel the need "of such nonsense" as the rendering of an invocation at the opening of the service, (they may object to that word as sounding "too much like the churches,") it is their privilege to dispense with it. As stated in the beginning, it is as natural to pray as to breathe, to sleep and to eat. Why not object to these because the church-people breathe, eat and sleep? Why not object to singing and preaching in our Spiritualistic meetings? Why hold meetings on Sunday at all, as it is the day for church gatherings? I cannot understand why we should eschew any good thing because it is in vogue with church-people. Are we not in danger of becoming a little like the Indian's tree, so straight that we lean just a little the other way, in our effort to get away from the churches?

Wherever I am known as a lecturer on Spiritualism, I am known as one who has no sympathy with hypocrisy, also as one who never caters to the church. When I poetize or sing, I do so because my nature compels me to do so; when enabled to express something of the harmony and rhythm I feel within, I am assisted into better mental conditions. When gratitude and aspiration well up within my soul, it is breathed forth as naturally as the birds sing, without any thought of what is done in the church. Even if such expression benefited no one else, I am always better for it. With all deference to my friends who think I have "so much nonsense mixed with Spiritualism," I shall go on in the even tenor of my way, "with malice toward none and charity for all." I do not desire to become an ape, nor a dogmatist, and I long since came to the conclusion that each one must do his work in his own way.

At the present time Mr. Hull and self are domiciled in Boston, as we are in the midst of the "Anniversary Jubilee," which covers nearly one week. "The Ladies' Aid" commenced the celebration the 26th. The following Sunday "The Temple Society" (of Berkley Hall) hold three sessions in Odd Fellows' Hall. Monday, "The State Association" holds three sessions in Berkley Hall. Wednesday, "The Veteran Spiritualists' Union" holds a convention in Horticultural Hall; Wednesday night the Jubilee concludes under the auspices of "The Helping Hand," in their place of meeting, Gould Hall. The best of talent in every department has been secured for all of these meetings. You may know we are busy at this time.

I cannot conclude this already too long communication without saying "The Spiritualists' Training School," will positively open on the first of June. Arrangements are under way, and interest in the enterprise increases. More concerning this in the near future. Suffice it to say that the opposition to the movement, in nearly every instance, comes from those who are the most in need of just such discipline as the proposed "Training School" will give its pupils. The leaders in the movement do not claim that it will be possible to "impart mediumship" or fit any and every one for the platform, but to those who "have the gifts," and to those who have an aspiration to enter the Spiritualist field as persons well fitted and "apt to teach," the school will be of great assistance.

With good wishes for workers and readers interested in the Thinker, I am most cordially, MATTIE E. HULL.

CHRISTIAN METHODS.

GLORIOUS GOSPEL!—GLAD TIDINGS!

"The end of life is not to do good, altho' a vast number of Christians think so."—Rev. Dr. Jackson, Columbus, O.

Notwithstanding the adverse opinion of "a vast number of Christians," Dr. Jackson is right from a truly Christian and Biblical standpoint.

Christ specifically settles this point when he emphatically states that "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." Good works not mentioned or implied.

"Man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law."—Rom. iii:28.

"To him that worketh not, but believeth on him who justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness." So the ungodly is safe, if he devoutly believes on one who justifies the class to which he belongs. Faith supplemented by "free grace" is substituted for works, and the way to heaven is made free and easy. None but fools and idiots will travel the long, rough and wearisome way of duty and self-sacrifice when the smooth and flower-skirted path of faith lies of easy access before them.

"He that believeth on the son, hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not on the son shall not see life but the wrath of God abideth on him."—John iii:36.

That settles it against the poor, unsuspecting heathen. Since the commencement of the Christian era fifty-eight generations on our planet, numbering each 800 million, have died without ever hearing of Christ, making the awful aggregate of forty-six billion, four hundred million of unsuspecting heathen who unwittingly dropped into hell without being apprised of the fact that failure to believe in one of whom they never heard, was the cause of their endless misfortune and misery. Millions for hell and that, too, of the noblest and best men and women who have ever lived, while a select few of the John Calvin and Torquemada type are enjoying the transcendent beatitudes of a seven-by-nine heaven. The latter few were ignorant and mean enough to embrace the popular faith, while countless myriads of the former were too honest and intelligent to accept it, and are now suffering the pangs of "unquenchable fire."

"Doomed to live death, and never to expire,
In floods and whirlwind of tempestuous fire,
The damned shall groan, fire of all kind and forms,
In rain and hail, in hurricanes and storms.
Liquid and solid, livid red and pale,
A flaming mountain here, and there a flaming vale."

Such is the description given by a distinguished Christian clergyman, of the boundless inferno prepared by the Christian's "Heavenly father" for the eternal dwelling-place of ninety-nine hundredths of his earthly children. "Glorious gospel!" "Glad tidings!" "Let the bells in gladness ring!" "Praise the Lord, for his mercy endureth forever!" "Selah!" Oh! Christianity, where is thy shame!

FIFTEEN CENTS!

PROF. BARRETT'S ADDRESS.

Other Subjects Treated of Especial Interest.

The Progressive Thinker is to be sent three months for 15 cents to all New subscribers.

Spiritualists, keep posted in current Spiritual events.

Why remain in ignorance? Why don't you keep posted in regard to the great Spiritualistic movement? Prof. Barrett delivered an address before the National Association of Spiritualists. It was an important one, and should be read by every Spiritualist in this broad land. We have had his address (which covers three pages of The Progressive Thinker) and five other important lectures and articles embodied in one paper, which we propose to send forth to illuminate the minds of those who have not had an opportunity to read them.

The first page of this paper contains he lect ure by Col. Ingersoll, given in a Chicago pulpit. It scintillates throughout.

The second page contains a highly interesting lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on the "Dwellings of the Dead."

The third page has a splendid article on "Science versus Theology," in review of Andrew D. White's two superb volumes.

The fourth page has another excellent lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on "Spiritual Unfoldment."

The fifth page is very suggestive throughout, and is devoted to the "Hindoo Teachers—They Will Try to Capture the United States."

On the sixth page commences Prof. Barrett's admirable address, occupying three pages.

We will also, in connection with this paper, send out another equally as valuable. The first page contains an excellent lecture by Virchand R. Gandhi, a learned Hindoo. The remaining seven pages contain the wonderfully thrilling narrative (founded on facts) entitled, "The Night the Light Went Out," exhibiting many of the inside workings of the Catholic Church. Besides the address by Mr. Ghandi and the remarkable narrative, "The Night the Light Went Out," the first page has an excellent communication obtained through Ouija. The second page has a startling statement in reference to the "Romish Octopus—It Is Winding Its Poisonous Coils Around Washington." The poem on the same page, "The Sad Picture of a Wrecked Human Life," is wonderfully suggestive. The third page has a striking illustration showing how the Romish Church treats heretics. This page and the fourth also have a continuation of the "Romish Octopus." The fifth page has that remarkable poem, "St. Peter At the Gate." Every freethinker should read it. It is full of excellent "points." It also contains interesting facts in reference to the Romish Church and offices. The sixth, seventh and eighth pages have the following: "Monasteries and Convents—Where Those Alive Are Entombed." "Rider Haggard and the Immuring of Nuns." This paper alone is well worth the price of a year's subscription.

Every Spiritualist in this broad land should have these two papers. Our regular subscribers have already read their contents. For Fifteen cents we will send the Progressive Thinker for three months to all New trial subscribers and also send these two valuable papers.

Bear in mind that by New subscriber we mean one who has not been on our list for at least three months. Those of our present subscribers who wish to buy these two papers can have them both now for five cents. All of our regular subscribers have read their contents.

Send The Progressive Thinker three months to some friend, and thus get him interested in the cause. Stamps taken on small orders.

We sincerely hope that no Spiritualist will be dishonest enough, or so dishonorable, as to take advantage of this offer, by continuing his paper when the time expires, in the name of some member of his family (or some one else) in order to get the benefit of this 15 cent offer, on which the publisher does not make a cent.

VERILY, WHAT NEXT?

Under the head of "A New Programme," we announced a radical new departure from the general routine of work assumed by the average Spiritualist paper. We do not follow old established usages unless we are thoroughly convinced that they are the best, which is very rarely the case. We established the original dollar Spiritualist paper, and introduced a new era in the line of Spiritualistic journalism. Others have followed after us, but in all candor the only thing in which they have equalled us, is in the price of the paper—one dollar.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker on the following terms:

The Encyclopaedia of Death and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. The Next World Interviewed at 35 cts. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	$ .45
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	.45
The Next World Interviewed	.35
Total	$1.25

NO. OF PAGES IN EACH BOOK.

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	400
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	400
The Next World Interviewed	250

Each of these books is neatly and substantially bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and as prices go, are well worth one dollar per volume.

Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker.

Remember, please, that in order to obtain these three books for $1.25, you must send along a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker; the paper one year, and the three books costing $2.25. It is the subscription to the paper that enables us to send you these three books at cost.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

Bear in mind, please, that we cannot publish weekly reports of meetings. Whenever a change is made in speakers, or anything of special interest, send us a brief item, please. A great deal can be expressed in a dozen lines; but long reports will not be used. Meetings are of local interest only. We extend a cordial invitation to all speakers to send in their appointments to lecture, and general movements, which will be read by at least 40,000. We go to press early Monday morning, and items must reach us as early as Friday or Saturday in order to have immediate insertion.

Communications must always be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer, or no attention will be paid to them.

J. E. Ferris writes from Lincoln, Nebraska: "We are doing what we can here to advance the cause of Spiritualism, and are succeeding admirably. The society is under the management of Mrs. C. L. Johns, who is one of the best test mediums that has yet visited Lincoln. The G. A. R. hall is crowded every Sunday evening to witness her wonderful tests, and the people of this city of universities are becoming awake to the great truths of a future life and spirit return. We hope to keep the light burning until spiritual truths become known to all and appreciated as they should be."

A. Markley writes from Topeka, Kan.: "There will be a spiritual camp-meeting held in Garfield Park, Topeka, Kan., commencing September 4, and continuing over three Sundays. The best speakers and mediums will be secured."

F. F. N. writes from San Jose, Cal.: "I desire to write of the most excellent work that is being done here by Dr. Coonley. He is organizing the new Spiritual Church and his labors are well received, and a new interest is being taken in Spiritualism. He is a young man and his lectures are of a higher order than those commonly heard on the spiritual platform, and he is a very forcible and logical speaker as well, and to hear the wonderfully sweet music given while he is in trance condition, is an inspiration indeed. His control uses two instruments at one time, and to say the music is grand don't begin to express it. It is the marvel of all who hear it. He also gives tests at the close of the lectures, and they are as fine as any I have ever heard, often giving full names and dates. I enjoy a good lecture, and Dr. Coonley's address on last Sunday was all that the most critical could desire. The subject was 'Knowledge vs. Superstition,' and he held the crowded hall almost breathless for an hour. I only wish the cause had more workers as thoroughly in touch with the 'other side' as Dr. A. B. Coonley, and as ready to assist others to the light. Long may such laborers live to break down the barriers of ignorance and superstition."

B. F. Underwood has returned from the East where he has been lecturing to full houses in New York, Brooklyn, Boston and other cities. He will make another trip East in April. Those who wish lectures by him should address him at once at 2653 Evanston avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs Minnie Wood writes the following appeal, to Spiritualists: "I wish to appeal to your generosity. On my way from California to Massachusetts, I stopped off here to visit a Spiritualist friend. While here the house was burned down and I lost all my personal effects, money and ticket, and had my hands so badly burned in trying to save my five-years-old orphan child, that I can do nothing. Will you each help me a little so I can get to Boston, then I can get business, as I am a clairvoyant and magnetic healer. Send what you can and I will give you a test from your writing. Address Mrs. Minnie Wood, Caledonia, Ohio."

Dr. and Mrs. Noyes would like engagements with societies for months of May, June and July. Inspirational lecturers, psychometrists and test mediums. Charges reasonable. Are open for camp-meeting dates of 1897. Address Dr. Noyes, 2016 Olive street, St. Louis, Mo.

James L. Moore writes from Brookville, Pa., that many of the best citizens there were favorably inclined toward Spiritualism, but through the blunder of an over-zealous convert, one D. B. Jemison was brought there and gave several seances—with such results that he was threatened with arrest unless he left the town immediately—and he left.

Chas. D. Knight writes from Seattle, Wash.: "In my short experience of some six years I have to my astonishment found out that a great deal of our opposition comes from so-called Spiritualists. Now with your permission I would suggest that all sincere spiritual people will do all they can to discountenance anything approaching to fraud, and to stay away from those meetings wherein everything and anything is to be given to the public. A move has been made by the doctors and ministers of this city against mediums. I think the time has come when the Spiritualists of every city, in fact, all over the country, should impress the authorities with the strength of their power as voters. These politicians will bow the knee to the voting power; therefore, let all Spiritualists who are voters show their strength, and make it understood that if this opposition continues they will feel themselves called upon to act as voters. This is the only power which will bring these people to time—at least I have found it so in my experience."

W. H. L. writes from West Potsdam, N. Y.: "Your highly prized paper comes to our little hamlet each week, freighted with gems of thought that must gladden the souls of many. I do not often see anything from this place, and for fear you will think we are dead, will say the cause of Spiritualism here is not wholly neglected. We have been having a rare feast. Mrs. Hannah Morse Baker was with us during February, and gave us lectures of a very high order. I would cheerfully recommend her to all societies. Our society expects to have her with us again in the near future. We have a small society of thirty-two members that meets every Sunday evening. Our officers are: E. E. Blood, president; Mrs. D. E. Paine, vice-president; F. S. Burnham, treasurer, and Elizabeth P. Lewis, secretary. We also have a very acceptable choir."

Charles Carter writes from Lancaster, O.: "I have had some wonderful tests. I think the Psyche helped me develop. I am using my gift free of charge in order that I may make converts, and develop rapidly. I understand that we are to have a better time than ever this summer at the National Summerland Beach Camp-meeting, at Millersport, O."

Dr. E. H. Denslow writes from Centreville, Ind.: "We were called to officiate at the marriage of W. R. Sturgis, of Sturgis, Mich., and Miss Addie Hennard, of Centreville, Ind., which occurred at the home of the bride's parents, near this place, on March 17. The wedding was somewhat novel from the fact that the groom is an Episcopalian, and the bride a Methodist, and a minister of the gospel of Spiritualism performed the ceremony. We have succeeded in creating much interest in our beautiful philosophy in this vicinity, and some of the most beautiful developments are following. We are pleased to note the wonderful progress our cause is making in all parts of the country where we have visited during the last autumn and winter."

M. B. Welcher writes from Marcellus, Mich.: "Dr. A. B. Spinney, of Reed City, Mich., has just closed a series of lectures on physiology and hygiene at this place, which were very interesting and instructive, and those that failed to hear them missed much that should have been added to their stock of knowledge and understanding. Brother Spinney also gave three lectures on Immortality and Spiritualism, which were of the highest order, and were highly complimented by all that heard him. Bro. Spinney is a very deep thinker and a fine speaker, and can do full justice to any subject that may be assigned him."

A. B. Severance, the well-known psychometrist, has taken up his residence at North Chicago, Ill., where he can be addressed.

A. D. Perry writes from Tomah, Wis.: "We had Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, a trance and inspirational speaker, from Stevens Point, Wis., with us for ten days in January. There were four lectures given, which were pronounced by believers and non-believers alike, grand and beautiful. We know a great deal of good has been done, and all who are seeking for the truth and philosophy of Spiritualism will be satisfied by having her come and give a few lectures. Her charges are reasonable, and you will also find her a grand, noble and true Spiritualist."

Ella Gibson Magoon writes from Kansas City, Mo.: "After a trip of some weeks, extending from Louisiana through Texas localities, we are turning our faces once more northward, and are glad to meet old friends and familiar faces once more, though many new-found friends in the Southland will hold our thoughts in association with pleasant memories. We shall be in this city during this month and the early part of April, and may be addressed at any time at 1012 New York Life Building, from which place mail will reach us, forwarded, when en route."

A trend of the times. In unity is strength. In Taunton, Mass., pastors of all the Protestant denominations in the city united to hold Sunday evening services in a theater during February. The people filled the theater, seats, stage, standing room.

H. W. Boozer writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "This city has had a spiritual feast. Perhaps one hundred persons have seen the full flower of phenomenal manifestation in the materializations from Mrs. Tripp, of Chicago. We had exceptional conditions in a 'holy of holies'—a place used for the one purpose alone, the production of physical phenomena. Materialization and dematerialization, a profusion of voices, recognitions, faces without veils, lace made and demade right before you, the passing of matter through matter, etherealization culminating in beautiful voice and sentiment from the extempore full form; twenty to forty forms in an evening, very much individualized, and the indescribable and almost continuous humor of the child control, were among the features of interest presented by the operating spirits and chemists."

India Hill writes from Decatur, Ill.: "Never was our city so thoroughly aroused to the investigation of Spiritualism as at the present time, as was proven by the fact of so many being present at the materializing seances given by C. E. Winans, at the home of Mrs. India Hill. It was proven to the entire satisfaction of all present that the spirits of loved ones do return. There appeared before the audience not less than twenty-five or more different spirits in full form, two or three at a time, in almost every instance walking out into the room and reaching out their hands to their friends and leading them up to the aperture in the cabinet, as if to the brink of the great river, and there seat them. Soon they would appear again, with renewed strength, and there hold converse in an audible and intelligent manner with their loved ones."

Rolla Stubbs, of Minneapolis, speaks in high terms of John Eouzet, as an inspirational lecturer.

The First Spiritual Church of Cincinnati, Ohio, has been incorporated by F. W. Nye, Hatfield Pettibone, J. E. Bruner, Theophelus Frantz and G. W. Bachman.

The Commercial Tribune says: "Jas. Brittingham, an enthusiast on Spiritualism, of West Union, Ohio, received an anonymous letter warning him that unless he ceased talking on the subject he would be treated to a coat of tar and feathers." Verily, the days of bigotry and intolerance are not yet over. A fragment of the 16th century still survives.

J. M. White writes from Unionville, Mo.: "On Sunday, April 4, I leave here for Bonaparte, Iowa, and mail addressed to me there will reach me at that point. Through this month I wish to only make two changes of location and would much prefer only one. I am open to engagements for the camp-meeting season. Those desiring to know my phase of mediumship will receive prompt replies to all letters addressed me at Bonaparte. I wish steady work through May and June, so when the camp-meeting season comes on I will be prepared financially to fill engagements. Work in Iowa and Minnesota preferred, though if I can get work in Lincoln, Neb., on sufficient guarantee, it will be acceptable. All parties writing me for engagements will please bear in mind that when I am sent for I bear no expenses of hall rent, or printing."

J. C. F. Grumbine, the well-known speaker, writes: "All honor to our esteemed co-worker, Hudson Tuttle! I have long since been tempted to write my cordial appreciation of the brilliant and forceful work of Hudson Tuttle for The Progressive Thinker. He is indeed a man of rare gifts, one who is erudite, profound and balanced, a seer and medium of unmistakable power, of insight and prescience. He is not half appreciated, although I congratulate the editor for calling him to an editorial work for which he is eminently qualified. While we honor the so-called dead, let us keep in mind the truly great who labor by our side. A man like our esteemed co-worker, Hudson Tuttle, should give an added value to your paper. His literary work alone is worth $50 a year to each Spiritualist. May he continue among us through a long autumn that will merge into a spring in which there will be a sweet Easter to him and us, without any winter."

P. Miller writes: "Mr. G. W. Runion, from near Muncie, Ind., made us a visit and gave us a grand trumpet seance, April 1. All got messages from their loved ones from the other side. Two trumpets were used. There were independent voices, singing and talking at the same time, playing musical instruments and ringing bells."

The First Spiritual Temple Society meets at 7820 Hawthorne avenue (Auburn Park), every Sunday evening at 7:30 o'clock. J. C. F. Grumbine is the permanent speaker. The school in metaphysics, psychometry, inspiration, psycopathy and clairvoyance convenes at the same place during the week. Friends in the city and strangers out of town are most cordially invited.

May F. Ayres, State Secretary, writes: "The Michigan State Spiritual Association has engaged G. H. Brooks, of Wheaton, Ill., as its State missionary, to commence his labors at once. All societies chartered or not can secure him by corresponding with him or the State secretary, at Lansing, Michigan. Wherever he works he is expected to be furnished hall and entertainment. He will also organize lyceums. Also wherever grove meetings are desired, his services can be secured."

H. S. Mitchell writes: "In your issue of April 3, Divine Wright, in the communication headed 'A Fragment of Old Superstitions and Intolerance,' has made some mistake as to dates, if I understand him rightly, viz.: Second column, line four, he says: "It may be protested by some delvers into deep and curious records that the statutes of James I., passed in 1603, was repealed under Henry VIII. in 1736;' also line twenty-two, he speaks of the 'repealing statute of Henry in 1736.' The facts are that Henry VIII. reigned from 1509 to 1547, nearly one hundred years before the time of James I. The king who ruled England in 1736 was George II., who ruled from 1727 to 1760."

The Band of Harmony will meet Thursday, April 8, with Mrs. Lhommedieu, 7748 South Peoria street. Take South Halsted street electric or Wentworth avenue electric.

E. W. Sprague, missionary for the N. S. A., and now working in the State of New York in the interest of a State association, has open time for the coming camp-meeting season, and can be engaged to lecture and give platform tests. Address him as follows until June 1: 965 Grove street, Meadville, Pa.

E. Summers writes: "Meetings at 151 East Randolph street, Sunday afternoons, under the auspices of the Independent Students of Nature, and direction of Mrs. M. Summers, continue to increase in interest. Dr. Hasenclever and Mr. Grubb have recently added great enthusiasm by their lectures and readings. Attendants are surprised at the revelations they receive from these three mediums."

Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, vice-president of the N. S. A., goes on to Washington to attend the quarterly meeting of the board, which occurs on the 5th. A convention is arranged in Washington for the 6th, with all the speakers on the board to help.

J. J. Jones writes from Philadelphia, Pa.: "I have no special words of praise to offer The Progressive Thinker, each number being a self-evident fact of its own merits. On the same principle I never 'praise God,' he not seeming to be in any particular need or want of my adulation."

Geo. H. Brooks returned from St. Joseph, Mo., last week. The society there is by far in a better state than when he went there. They had had sad experiences with some who had been there, and the society was greatly weakened; but they are united now, and in time will do a better work. They celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary, and Mr. Brooks was assisted in the work by Doctor and Mrs. Magoon, who are to remain there for the month of April. Mrs. T. J. Mullen is now president. Mr. Brooks will respond to calls to lecture, to officiate at funerals and weddings. Address him by letter or telegram at Wheaton, Ill.

L. D. Putnam writes from Pennsylvania: "The book, 'The Next World Interviewed,' received in good order. My daughter and myself have read it and to say we have enjoyed it, is not the half. We have always been Spiritualists, and had our own views upon these subjects. This meets our views. It is so natural. We are doing what we can for Spiritualism by living and teaching its higher truths to the best of our knowledge, and the help of the dear ones gone before, and are glad to lovingly stand by what we believe. We come in close touch with the unseen world. We have received more education and loving care than from any other sourse. Always so truthful, I go to them for advice, and receive it as naturally as from this side of life, with this exception. I can trust it better. If people would reach out for the highest and best, keeping their own thoughts pure and good, they would receive the truth. The highest, best and purest thoughts, with love divine, will find more of the same in all mankind, and making our own dwelling a fit place for angel visitants. Then we are made able to lift others up."

NEW YORK STATE SPIRITUALISTS

This is the last appeal to you through the columns of the press to come to the State convention, to be held at Syracuse, April 13, 14, and 15, to organize a State Association. We need it and you need it.

We will have business sessions and the evenings and the last day for music, speeches and messages. Come! Come! Come! Let there be such an awakening that those outside will know that we are aroused to action. H. D. Barrett, Cora L. V. Richmond, L. V. Moulton, of the N. S. A., Lyman C. Howe, Dr. Fred L. H. Willis, Carrie E. S. Twing, Judge Dailey, Mary Pepper, Maggie Gaule, Dr. W. B. Mills, W. J. Colville, Mrs. Clara Watson, E. W. Sprague, Mrs. C. A. The World's Advanced Thought of Portland, Oregon, says: "The Progressive Thinker, has steadily improved since its first appearance, and it is now one of the cheapest, most popular and widely circulated of the Spiritualist papers. It is only one dollar per year."

Dr. E. D. Babbitt says: "We know from countless facts that we have a more interior vision, a more spiritual ear and a greatly quickened power of feeling, all of which can be brought into action by the psychic ethers when not smothered by the coarser animal ethers which we use in the ordinary consciousness of every day life. With this refined vision we can see a more glorious phase of all the universe around us including spiritual beings, for the psychic lights and colors are immensely penetrating." Dr. Babbitt is now a resident of California. He is the author of several popular works and knows whereof he speaks.

"Health is not merely a luxury, it is a necessity," and Col. Ingersoll would have "good health" catching, thus reversing the usual methods of epidemic diseases.

Our good Brother Newman has had a right royal reception in San Francisco. Everything that was said in his favor was decidely sweet, refreshing and cheering, and ought to have increased his height six inches at least and made him in that proportion more weighty. But did it increase his subscription list?

J. C. F. Grumbine says: "Whether such an institution as the N. S. A., shall exist is at the discretion of those who are interested in its behalf. It does its work when it discharges its business obligations; it exceeds its office when it enters the field as an exponent of Spiritualism."

"The powers of the soul are so various and countless in number, that one may exhaust the vocabulary of names to designate the forces that emanate from it, and yet have to invent new ones. The world, generally, is disputing about the names given to these forces. Some maintain that hypnotism comprises the powers of the soul; others, magnetism; others again, auto-suggestion, and so on. None of these disputants know what the powers of the soul really are, and what it is that heals. They perceive that certain manifestations follow the observance of certain rules, and give it a name, and then quarrel with all who give it a different name. Until men cultivate and practice Love and Wisdom they will continue to quarrel about names." So says the World's Advanced Thought.

"A heaven-born soul will not, even in his dreams, play the Sensualist." Of course not, for he has never tasted of the "forbidden fruit."

"The Universe is only Man written large," says S. A. Merrill. Quite anthropomorphic that, including both God and the Devil. What next?

Mrs. R. S. Lillie is still in California where she seems to be doing a good work. Referring to the statement that the Fox sisters at one time denied their mediumship, Mrs. Lillie in an address in San Francisco, Cal., said that the Fox family were all church members and the mother a praying woman. "If Spiritualism was of the Devil, why did not God answer that good woman's prayers and suppress those early manifestations instead of permitting them to spread like prairie fires all over the civilized world? Referring again to the exposure of Spiritualism by the Fox girls the speaker said that Christianity had its Judas and Peter, and Spiritualism had its Maggie and Kate."

"Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God." The greatest of all tyrants is the Catholic church in Spain, in some sections of South America, and in various localities of the United States. In opposing that church, one demonstrates his obedience to God.

"When we realize the God in us—that we are God—that we are infinite, death will indeed have lost its sting, and the grave its victory. Then, in fact, there will be no death. Man will be so spiritual that, like Elijah, he will be seen to ascend." So says Moses Hull. That expression is broad enough to include the fourth dimension of Prof. Crooke; in fact it exalts the mortal to a high plane—and who will object to occupy it?

Chicago has the largest of everything—even the largest Spiritualist paper.

The camp-meeting season is just beginning to bud.

But I shall endeavor, says Enos, to show that the social evils of the time are something against which we should take a stand, not only individually, but collectively. To do this I must lay down certain premises, as follows:

1. Spiritualism claims to be a religious movement, therefore Spiritualists must be religious men.
2. Every movement claiming to be a religious movement, must also concern itself with Social Reform.
3. Any movement claiming to be a religious movement, and not taking an active part in the progressive lives of the people, is neither logical nor sincere, and is, therefore, unworthy of support.
4. Spiritualism claims to be superior to all other systems of worship; therefore the superiority of Spiritualism must be demonstrated.
5. If Spiritualism is not superior to other systems it has no claim upon the people, therefore we must consider in what respects Spiritualism is superior to other systems, and why the other systems have failed.
6. The chief reasons why the old systems no longer claim the affection of the people are—(1) Because they have proclaimed so many things as facts which could not be demonstrated; and (2) because they were no longer actively concerned in the welfare of the people.
7. The Religious Philosophy of the future must be able to demonstrate its facts of a spiritual nature (if any), and must supersede all others in its ardor and activity for public weal.

MEDICAL BILL DEFEATED.

To the Editor:—The bill introduced by Senator Lee, to amend the present existing medical law, has been defeated. Had it become a law Nebraska would have exceeded any State in the Union in medical monopoly. The M. Ds. are not at all satisfied with their present law now upon the statutes of this State. Hon. C. T. Muffly, senator from Madison county, should be complimented by every Spiritualist in this country for being instrumental in defeating this measure. I wish that every Spiritualist who can spare the time would write a letter of congratulation to the Senator for his determination to crush out this monopoly. Address him as follows: Hon. C. T. Muffly, Meadow Grove, Neb.

Mr. Muffly is a Methodist in faith, and has been for many years. He is 62 years old. Shower him with letters; it may be the means of electing him to the same place two years hence. I expect to be better prepared at the next session of our law-makers to defeat and repeal all laws that have a tendency to enslave or infringe upon the rights of any class of people of this commonwealth. During the present session I have fought the battle lone handed. Let us rejoice that things are no worse than they are. Now please don't forget Senator Muffly. Send him a letter.

DR. P. S. GEORGE.

From Light, London, Eng.

AT WINDSOR CASTLE, ENG.

I cannot quite understand why the English papers (as far as my very limited knowledge of them goes) have made no reference to the above subject. I am indebted for my knowledge of the report to a paragraph in the "Petit Journal" for January 18, which I translate. It is headed "The Windsor Ghost."

QUEEN ELIZABETH.

At the present moment the one great subject of conversation at the English Court is that of the supernatural phenomena of which for some time Windsor Castle has been the theater. This royal residence, it seems, is haunted, and it is even affirmed that every night Queen Elizabeth or her shade walks its corridors. All the inhabitants of the castle are in a state of terror, and the Princess Beatrice has been obliged to change her apartment on account of the strange and unaccountable noises which have disturbed it.

TERRIFIED ENGLISH.

At all events, these apparently supernatural occurrences have made such an impression on the inhabitants of the castle that recruiting of the night guard has become a matter of great difficulty. The terrified English refuse the service, and the authorities are obliged to have recourse to the Irish, who show themselves less timid, and perhaps consider themselves, as Catholics, better armed for combat with the daughter of Henry VIII.

GROANS.

It is declared that the nightly promenade of the Windsor ghost is accompanied by the sound of groans, the burden of the complaint being, "You have destroyed my work."

THE ENGLISH CATHOLICS

conclude (not without a certain amount of satisfaction) that the Queen, who was the nursing mother of the Reformation in England, watches the Catholic movement now at work in the United Kingdom with great bitterness of spirit.

THE VALENCE-EN-BRIE "HAUNTINGS, have naturally much helped to bring the subject thus prominently before the public. The inmates of the house in question, one an invalid lady, were greatly distressed at the disturbances. Furniture was thrown about, windows were broken, and a voice, indulging in odious language, was heard. All this lasted for some weeks. The doctors, the parish priest, and certain strong-minded neighbors tried in vain to solve the mystery, until one Abbe Schnebelin did something which seems to have put a stop to the demonstrations, though no one seems to be any the wiser as to the cause of the disturbances, or the means by which they were made to cease, if indeed they were made to cease at all.

THE PHOTOGRAPHIC EXPERIMENTS of Dr. Baraduc, if verifiable, are unspeakably important. His conclusion is that every person has a "fluidic" existence,—what we should call a life-principle or spirit-self. This fluidic or spirit-self, he maintains, sends forth emanations corresponding to every thought or emotion (a notion familiar enough to our readers), and he asserts that he has proved it, by actually photographing these emanations. The photographic plate is placed under the hand or on the forehead, and the mental or emotional condition is made visible upon it.

A PHOTOGRAPHIC PLATE,

placed on the forehead of a woman praying, showed something like a flame. Certain plates revealed swirls as of a snow storm; others showed only mist; on others there were forms. We have heard from other directions, that the emotions of anger or affection produce strangly dissimilar and curiously symbolical pictures. In some cases, says The "Standard's" correspondent, Dr. Baraduc discovered in the blurred cloudy photograph the forms of either the persons whose "fluidic soul" had produced the impression, or of the persons or things which those persons were thinking of at the moment.

THOUGHT AWAKENERS.

'Tis the wounded bird that flutters, and 'tis a foolish bird that goes where it will be wounded.

I did not begin to live until I died to the world. As I want nothing that the world can give, I am looking for nothing but I still see man fall before the tempter.

There are some men who will never forgive another if they perpetrate a crime, to them, of knowing more than they do.

If we would find perfect happiness, we must live for others (contentment) and not for another (selfishness).

It is not necessary for innocence to prove its own existence. Innocence is of the spirit and not of the flesh. A guilty conscience stands self-condemned, while the flesh may be innocent.

To live and to work for one's self will by no means promote happiness, but is a source of eternal misery.

A spiritually shallow person should never venture into the deep waters of occult science.

Egotists always mistake honest, positive expression in another as egotism. Knowledge always asserts itself, and never quotes another as authority for the truth uttered.

We cannot avert a trouble when we have brought it into existence, but we can meet it, and thus destroy much of its power to injure us.

We must become Truth before Truth can find itself in us.

MYSTICAL MADNESS.

The number of cases of mystical madness in France is increasing daily. They are caused by visions and visionaries, not only in distant and benighted provinces, but in Paris and the larger towns. The French bishops are endeavoring to cope with this craze of fanaticism, which appears to be as political as it is religious. Tireuse, a village near Moulins, is, says the Chronicle, the new center of attraction for the credulous.

MME. JEANE TULLE

is a young married woman of ethereal appearance, who is supposed to have had certain visions. The periods of ecstacy are very striking. The "voyante" is raised from her bed and her eyes become fixed. She recites prayers, and appears to be quoting some ascetic work. The husband of Mme. Tulle declares that these phenomena have been going on for nearly two years.

HERB PROPHECY.

A plant grows in Mixteca, Mexico, which the natives call the "herb of prophecy." A dose of it produces sleep similar in all respects to the hypnotic state. The subject answers with closed eyes questions that are put to him, and is completely insensible. The pathologic state brings with it a kind of prophetic gift and double sight. Furthermore, he loses his will, and is completely under the control of another. On returning to himself he remembers nothing of what he has done.

From The Spiritual Review, London, Eng.

PAVED WITH GOOD INTENTIONS.

Hell, 'tis said is paved with good intentions. It is a good guess, but "paved" is not the word. "Peopled" is the word. When we are in hell, we see our good intentions in palpable shape all around us. They touch us now and then, to call our attention, and we cannot choose but look. It is a part of our punishment.

GOOD RESOLUTIONS.

And when we look, we see a long vista, the happy consequences of some good resolution, had we kept it; the benefits we missed by turning aside from the right track; the bliss we lost by rejecting some choice of good that was offered us. And the sudden realization of what we have missed burns us as with white fire. Yet we cannot choose but look.

IT IS ALL GRAY-DARK IN HELL,

excepting when we gaze steadily into the gloom. Then we see what does not make us happy. And there are white ghosts floating about—light withered things. You know what it is to have your flesh creep? Well, when the spirit creeps it is worse. When one of these ghosts comes nigh, it makes one's spirit creep.

SAD WOMEN IN HELL.

There are many sad women here in hell—aye, and men too, who are haunted by little white ghosts of babes. And the little wizened things peer into the faces of their mothers and fathers that might have been. "Oh, why did you not bear me?" they wail woefully to the one; "Oh, why did you not beget me?" to the other. And those thus accosted have to look, and they see the happiness they have missed by not doing as God bade them; and the vision gives them pangs like those of one's body being consumed by white fire. But immeasurably worse, for the spirit is the "quick" of the human entity, and it is laid bare in hell.

WHY DID YOU NOT WED ME?

Then there are the ghosts, that visit those of either sex who chose celibacy on earth. Ghosts of wives and husbands that should have been. "Why did you not wed me," they cry. "See what might have been." And vistas of the bliss of twin-souls happily mated appear; but it is too late, too late, and the tortured spirits writhe in agony.

From Two Worlds, London, England.

THE HELLS OF DANTE AND MILTON

were painted with terrible force and skill, but we are quite sure their descriptions never proved a deterrent to evil doers. In fact, no description of that awful place of torment ever deterred men from sin—nor ever will. The great Ghibeline's hell was both a religious and political place of punishment; friends and foes are alike portrayed there.

CLAIRVOYANT REVELATIONS.

Although John Milton's Devil is a far more terrible personage than the noble Florentine's, both the Divina Comedia of Dante and the "Paradise Lost" of Milton bear the unmistakable impress of clairvoyant revelations. The minds of both poets were strongly imbued with their peculiar religious beliefs. In the writings of Dante we perceive the inquisitorial gloom and severity. In Milton's, the puritanical rigidness coloring the entire poem.

SWEDENBORG'S VIEWS.

It is a strange fact that the clairvoyant revelations of Swedenborg resembled both the descriptions of Dante and Milton. Whether the philosopher's mind was colored by reading their two great dramatic works, or whether he really saw with his own eyes all that he describes in his visits to the Nethermost, will ever remain an unsettled question, just as will that other question, i.e., whether Dante really visited Hell, in company with Virgil, in clairvoyant vision. True, the children in the streets of Florence plucked his gown, and whispered to each other, "See, the man who has beheld the flames of Hell."

DISCORDANT NOISES.

Swedenborg gives us more local details in description of Hell. He tells us of "stinking pits," of other places full of dreadful discordant noises; also, like the Florentine and England's blind old man, he describes abodes of darkness, where the extremes of heat and cold meet and blend to torture the damned therein.

BURNING BRIMSTONE.

The lake of burning brimstone, so dear to the Calvinistic mind, must have originated in seeing some volcanic eruption, such as the Solfaterso Stromiboli Vesuvius, and that other more terrible crater in America—the Cotopaxi, a place all ready made to hand, above the earth in broad daylight, where there is "unquenchable fire." Probably some highly-imaginative individual among the churchmen of the first or second centuries took these actual and natural phenomena to illustrate his ideas of future punishment, and produce a sensational effect among his flock.

INTERMEDIATE CONDITION.

The Protestant Party eliminated purgatory from their states of punishments, just to be different from their Roman Catholic brethren, whom, we think, were nearer the mark in having an intermediate condition for the ordinary rank and file of sinners, while for the positively bad—those who smashed the Decalogue wholesale—hell was their portion. For those negatively good people, Limbo was a kind of neutral state very appropriate for their neutrality. Altogether the Roman Catholic idea of degrees or conditions is nearer the truth and common sense, for whether in our conception of God, Heaven, Purgatory, or Hell, we must be reasonable, and exercise our common sense, which is the most uncommon sense of all our senses.

HELL ONLY A CONDITION.

Hell is a condition which we make for ourselves here and hereafter. The delinquent born here, if not cured in this time-sphere will certainly be cured after he, or she, "crosses the Bar." Entrance into the Eternal Port will perhaps not be triumphant nor jubilant for them, but there they will be cured, educated, improved, perfected to their highest capacities. In the Father's home there are many mansions. For the greatest sinner there is also a place at the Father's table when that lost one is fit to appear among the guests. Progression is the creed for the enfranchised souls. We are none of us wholly responsible for actions. We inherit from our ancestors defects of organism and character which color our lives and mould our respective destinies, "rough-hew them as we will."

DEATH AND THE AFTER LIFE.

By Andrew Jackson Davis. Something you should read. Price 75 cents.

Researches in Oriental History.

BY G. W. BROWN, M. D.

One Vol. 12mo, 407 Pages, Cloth, $1.50.

GENERAL DIVISION.

1. RESEARCHES IN JEWISH HISTORY.
2. RESEARCHES IN ZOROASTRIANISM.
3. DERIVATION OF CHRISTIANITY.
4. WHENCE OUR ARYAN ANCESTORS?

The whole comprises an earnest but fruitless search for a Historical Jesus.

In this volume the Jews are clearly shown not to have been the holy and favored people they claim to have been. The Messianic idea is traced to the Bactrian Philosopher, 2350 years B. C., and its history is outlined, following the waves of emigration, until it is fully developed into Christianity, with a mythical hero, at Alexandria, in Egypt, soon after the commencement of the Christian era.

The book demonstrates that Christianity and its central hero are mythical; that the whole system is based on fraud, falsehood, forgery, fear and force; and that its rites, ceremonials, dogmas and superstitions are but survivals of so-called paganism. It shows vast research among the records of the past; its facts are mostly gleaned from Christian authority; and no person can read it without instruction and profit, whether he reaches the same conclusions with the author or otherwise.

THE KORAN.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of the distinguished author, speaker and medium,

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

L. L. E: Q. Where can I get a medal or charm that I can wear and thus restore myself to health and strength?

A. All medals, charms, belts, magnets, of whatever form or name, depend on mental impression for their efficacy. Aside from this they have no value. The best of all "charms" to wear is light and healthful clothing; garments that do not in any way bind or fetter the free movement of every muscle and organ. To this "charm" add healthful food, pure, fresh air, generous exercise and if health and strength are not restored, they will be looked for elsewhere in vain.

H. Trombly: Q. If, as we read, spirits are condemned by their own conscience, do you suppose they condemn themselves to miserable, dark places? And who keeps a record of their conduct?

A. The condemnation of conscience affects the spirit, just as it would in the earth-life. It is not necessary for the troubled conscience to seek a lonely isle or a reeking cavern. There are tortures of the mind, which physical pain relieves. Wherever the suffering spirit, it may be said to be in darkness. It cannot go away from itself, and although it stood in the midst of a group of radiant angels, it would be lonely, with the gloom of night environing it. The records of life are kept on the ineffaceable tablets of memory. The recording angel is always present, for it is the spirit's self.

J. Steadman: Q. (1) If the wrong is in the act, is not the same act as wrong when committed by church or State as by an individual?

(2) Is not God the personification of good? When was the God-idea created out of good?

A. If absolute right be considered, then the collective rights of a community of individuals cannot be different from the rights of each individual composing it. But all government less than the perfect organization controlling a perfect people must be expediency and choice of the better for a worse. Thus an individual has no right to deprive another of liberty or life. If the individual were allowed to decide, and become a law unto himself, there would be a relapse to barbarism. The community by its laws makes decisions for the interests of all, for every one feels the necessity of security of his life and possessions.

This high power of the community over its component individuals, should not exceed absolute necessities. If it is found by experience that a lower degree of punishment protects the community, that lower should be used. Neither justice nor right justifies cruel punishments; as tortures and loathsome dungeons, or sentences not looking to the reform of the criminal as well as protection of society. Capital punishment should not be resorted to, if it is found that imprisonment equally well protects the community.

It is now becoming an open question whether government has a right to exceed measures of reform of its criminal individual members. The old method of vindictive, retaliatory punishment has borne bitter fruits, and is now well understood to be not only debasing to the criminal, but to the community.

As for the power of the church as a governing power, it has no delegate right whatever. It can show none from a higher source, and when, as in the past, it has subjugated individual rights and punished disobedience, it has placed itself side by side with the outlaw, the robber, and pirate.

In passing, one thing cannot be too deeply impressed. The assumption of this high power by the community, or the majority, demands imperatively, for its just use, the thorough intellectual and moral culture of all. With ignorance comes abuse and intolerable tyranny.

(2) The confounding of good and God is of recent origin. In the Saxon, good and God were represented by the same word, god, which occurs in no other language. The words for God usually mean ruler, or lord, while good is primarily, strength, free, strong, advancing—quite distinct from the idea of God. While there has been a tendency from remote times to refer evil to a personal Devil, and all good to a personal God, this has taken more tangible form by this chance resemblance of the words. The modern conception of God is the personification of all good, power and strength; the complete blending of the two meanings of the Saxon word god, which has been retained with many another in English speech.

The God-idea began with the conception of savage man, of a terrible being, like himself but vastly stronger, who ruled the world in an irresponsible manner, as pleased his own selfish whims. This idea has been evolving through the ages, and now has become man's highest ideal of power and goodness. Although this conception is held in abeyance by the Bible teachings which present the ideal God of 5,000 and 2,000 years ago.

The end of the God-idea will be when man learns that beyond the laws and forces of nature he cannot know; that any worship he may give is an appeal to the unchangeable that asks not for, nor is benefited by such devotion. If it may be so called, the only service man can render to the Supreme, is obedience to the laws of his being.

Let man think less of God and more of himself. It is not bringing God to him, to bend to the voice of his prayer, but lifting himself up to the sphere of greatness, of love and spirituality, that is demanded. The most exalted ideas which can be formed of God mark the possible attainments of those who entertain them. The end, then, of the God-idea, is the perfection of man—a perfect man.

A. T., Lewick, Md.: Q. I live in a small town where spiritual mediums and lecturers are unknown. Now if this is such a grand knowledge for humanity, why are matters so that multitudes are not able to be convinced, and will live and die without a single opportunity?

A. Our spirit friends are as anxious to communicate with us, as we are with them, and gladly avail themselves of every opportunity. But the majority shut the door in their faces, or at least refuse to open it, and then complain, as though their words were conclusive, that they cannot receive communications. There are speakers anxious to be heard, and mediums who would gladly visit such people. Then why this complaint, as though it were argument? One good medium and a lecturer would convert any such place in three months' time into a stronghold of the cause.

If this is not acceptable; if there is fear of popular sentiment, or the mind is not fully convinced as to the status of Spiritualism, there is always open to all the family circle, which is the Spiritualists' prayer-meeting. Gather those who are interested around the family table, select with care a few friends. Have them promise to meet for at least six seances, and with an earnest desire and purpose do all that is possible to allow the friends on the other side to communicate.

In the circle thus formed there is sure to be some spirit in unison with at least one member.

If any live and die without a single opportunity to know the truths of Spiritualism, it is their own fault, for the fountain flows for all.

"B": Q. (1) Is it possible for a human body to be formed and no soul take possession of it, as in lowest idiots?

(2) When the dual germs are divided and one half is incarnated, does the other half have to incarnate in the same race, at nearly the same time, and does each germ have the same rate of progress?

A. (1) It is not necessary for the germ to be taken possession of by a soul or spirit, for its growth. Nor is it true that because it grows, whatever impels its growth is a spirit and immortal. Until it has reached a certain perfection of growth it cannot be said to have an individualized spirit. The study of pathology will convince anyone that this statement is true. It is because this growth is not observed that such theories are entertained; drawn from the "internal consciousness," in utter ignorance of facts. A germ may start in its growth and become a monstrosity without scarce a resemblance to a human being. It may develop into a tumor of strangely agglomerated parts; it may become a body without a brain, or only an apology for that organ. No spirit has "taken possession," or more correctly, the attempt to evolve a spirit has been a failure, as well as to create a body.

(2) We infer from the question that "B" has in mind the very ancient idea that there were two halves which journeyed into and through mortal life, and true marriage was when these came together. Hence it was obligatory that these should enter this life at the same time and place or they would not find each other. At least, "B" thinks that the soul-germ is double, and hence the query.

Again we have to meet an idea which came as an explanation of phenomena, before these were carefully observed, or observed at all; ideas which were dreams of childhood. The study of embryology proves that the germ is single, and as for the soul-germ, we know nothing, and it is only a fancy unsupported by the least evidence, and entirely needless to explain the facts. Up to a certain time the germ develops into the composite organization of both male and female, and then follows in one or the other direction. In rare instances there is an imperfect physical development of both. The full discussion of this subject leads to grounds which have been by the feelings of delicacy left to the treatment of medical science. We can only briefly reply that before we theorize on the incarnation of "dual germs" we must first prove that there are such germs, and they are required to explain the phenomena attending the genesis of life.

UNCLE JOSH AN' THE DEACON.

I wus talkin' with er deacon down in town the other day,
Erbout the style of churches an' religion of terday,
An, he kinder sighed an' grunted way down inter himself
That "All the true religion wus upon an upper shelf,
An' the victims of perdition aroun' the mourner's seat,
Wus only thar er learnin' just how ter lie an' cheat."
He said he fit their notions an' he prayed with all his might,
But in spite of all his prayin' truth is sinkin' out o' sight.
He pinted ter the spires an' his saddened, whitish face
Told plain ter me the sorrow thet they brought the human race.
Here was whar he'd worshiped ever since he was a boy.
An' here was whar he married his boyish heart's own joy,
Whar the preachin' an' the prayin,' an' the singin' was so good,
An' so simple, an' so common that it all wus understood;
An' it seemed ez though Jehovah he wus right amongst 'em then,
But he knowed with all these fashions thet He'd never come again.
But when he got done talkin' of the church of former years,
I give him some new logic thet soon brushed away the tears.
I told him thet the children of the deacons of the past,
Hed worn their parent's clothin' till they wus gone at last
An' thet styles an' tastes is changin' an' advancin' every day,
Till the church hed lost its devil an' its hell hed blowed away;
Till their Bible's picked ter pieces an' their God is tempered down
Ter the mercy of er human 'stead of demon with er crown.
Then the deacon sorter chuckled at the thoughts of changin' God
From er great an' mighty ruler on a throne, an' golden rod,
Ter a human an' a spirit with more mercy fer the bad;
An' yit there come er twinkle in his eye thet made me glad;
Then I showed him how the verses so long ago composed,
An' so fondly sung by all could easy be transposed.
Then he commenced with me—"When I can read my title clear,"
"To truth's celestial skies," said I. The deacon shed a tear.
"I'll bid farewell ter every fear," in tremblin' voice he sung,
"An' wipe my joyful eyes," says I—an' then more tears wus slung.
I told him how ter pray fer things he allers knowed he'd git,
An' then he'd prove thet prayer wus right, an' right would allers hit.
An' when I read him from the Thinker an "Old Hymn Transposed,"
He then an' thar wus made anew—content—fer he'd supposed
Thet God hed helped ter make thet song fer saints erlone ter sing.
Oh, how awful much of comfort these progressive minds do bring.

LYCEUM LESSONS

As Presented by Hudson Tuttle.

GOLDEN THOUGHT.

One great soul comprehending and unselfishly devoted to its duty is stronger than the combined forces of the world.

SUBJECT:

What shall we do to be saved?

For the older groups: If you had committed a grave crime and were sentenced to death by torture, and a friend should offer to die, that you might go free, would you accept the sacrifice? If not, why? No. No one honorable could do so.

No one can thus suffer for another, for every one must answer for himself. We are like swimmers in a stream where no friendly hand can support us. We have to rely on ourselves, or drown. We are not to look without for assistance, but within. Courage, reason, will—these are the forces of the soul which win the battle.

To convert is to turn about, and as all men are from ignorance constantly getting into wrong ways, they have to turn about, as constantly.

Hence conversion cannot be sudden. A man cannot be saved in a moment. He is being saved all the time. Every time he turns from error to the right he is saved from the consequences of wrong-doing. Hence it takes a whole lifetime for salvation, as it takes a life time to fashion the character.

What are we to save ourselves from?

From ignorance—by gaining knowledge;

From disease—by observing the laws of health;

From the control of the appetites and passions—by the cultivation of the spiritual.

For the younger groups: Leaders may in their own language tell the story of the building of a beautiful house. The bricks are bought, the mortar tempered, the foundation stones laid, the material for the roof, and the windows, doors, and finishing material, all brought together. Each brick or hod of mortar is a little thing, of itself, but when all is put together by the builder, the whole is a stately edifice, beautiful in all its lines.

So our characters are formed by the little deeds and passing thoughts, which alone are scarcely noticeable, but put together make our characters, and as they are, so the total will be. It may be thought little things to speak respectfully to the aged; to confess our error; to be faithful in common cares; yet all these go to the formation of our characters. The boy who, when asked to kindle a fire, does it faithfully, and is not satisfied until it burns brightly, is qualifying himself for high responsibilities when he becomes a man. The girl who does not forget the wants of her pet canary and leave its care to others, is cultivating that thoughtfulness for others which will bring her blessings.

(The members may relate incidents in their daily lives; the leaders adding commentaries thereon, showing how momentous the smallest actions become, closing with some story showing the necessity of attending to details.

MEMORY GEMS.

Religion, if it mean anything, means reliance on the absolute supremacy of law.

We should love truth for its own sake better than anything else in the world.

To gain the truth is the constant effort of mankind.

Love is the divine power which reveals itself in obedience to the laws of the physical and spiritual world.

Its justice is merciful; it has infinite charity and benevolence.

Let us not depend on another, but ourselves.

We do not want a staff, but to be master of our own strength.

SILVER CHAIN.

QUOTATIONS.

I do not wish to indulge in personalities, but I make the following quotations without comment, leaving the readers to form their own conclusions.

"I never mix my morality with my religion.

"I believe a clearer conception will be gained of both by holding them as entirely distinct from each other.

"Morality has relation to our dealings with our fellow creatures here in this life, while religion has reference to our Creator. It is one of the most common observations to see people very pious and yet very immoral, and vice versa. This fact is very puzzling to the mass of mankind that believe a truly religious person must of necessity be moral, for they are taught that morality is always included in true religion. The dictionary says religion is a system of faith and worship. I would omit the word 'system,' and say simply that religion is faith in a Creator and reverence for him or it, according as one believes in a person or a Creative energy."—Samuel Blodgett, in The Progressive Thinker, No. 383.

"The true religious code and the moral are one. The most moral man is the most religious. Every thing outside of a well-ordered life—a life devoted to the most perfect accomplishment of the object of being, under the name of whatever religion—is a sham. . . . Furthermore, and a fact of great significance, religious feelings and observances become refined and elevated, and tend to disappear in morality, in exact ratio to the advance of reason and knowledge."—Hudson Tuttle, Religion of Man, pages 53 and 56.

"Religion, pure and simple, is the aspiration of the soul to the source of its being, as the child to its parents, however crudely expressed, and the love element is what binds us to one another and to God. . . . Religion, in its last analysis, is a true life, embracing all that is good, pure, honest, just, moral and spiritual. Live this life with all its work, and call it what you please. 'A rose by any other name smells as sweet.'"—R. Neely, in The Progressive Thinker, No. 379. R. NEELY.

INTERMEDDLING.

The well-informed correspondent of the Chicago Record, Mr. Wm. E. Curtis, furnishes the following instructive account of Romish intermeddling with political affairs in Canada:

It is learned at the Catholic legation here that his holiness determined to send Mgr. Merry del Val, who sailed from London yesterday, as an apostolic delegate to the church in Canada in compliance with the request of Mr. Laurier, the prime minister, who sent Charles Fitzpatrick, solicitor-general of Canada, and Mr. Russell, of Manitoba, as special envoys to Rome to explain the situation and the causes and possible consequences of the struggle that is now going on there between the hierarchy and the government. Mgr del Val is an attache of the vatican, and has the full confidence of the Pope and Rampola, the cardinal secretary of State. The mission of the legate is to straighten out matters among the hierarchy and arrange for peace between the government and the church. Cardinal Taschereau is living, but is out of his mind, and governs the church through Archbishop Begin, of Quebec, as regent. The latter has been very radical in his opposition to the policy of the liberal party in Canada, and active in his interference with political affairs. He started for Rome as soon as he learned the mission of Solicitor-General Fitzpatrick, but it is not believed that he made much impression there. He appealed to the holy father not to interfere with Canadian affairs, and demanded his support for the sixteen bishops who are opposing the liberal party. But after hearing his arguments and explanations the Pope decided that it was not only expedient but necessary to send an impartial legate to make an investigation and report.

Before his departure for Rome, Archbishop Begin sent to the clergy of Canada a circular letter, to be read from the pulpit, commanding all Catholics to vote at the coming election for those candidates only who have the religious and moral interest of the country at heart, and warning them that to support the enemies of the church is a sin which cannot be condoned. By the "enemies of the church" he means the liberal party.

Archbishop Langevin has gone still further, and has instructed the clergy in his diocese that Catholics guilty of the "sin" of voting for liberal candidates will be refused the sacrament and absolution and cannot be buried in consecrated ground. All spiritual penalties are imposed upon those who "sin" by supporting the liberal party. The interference of the church in politics has become a political issue, particularly in the province of Quebec, which is very largely Catholic. Not only are the faithful forbidden to vote for liberal candidates, but the liberal papers are interdicted, and the parish priests refuse absolution not only to the voter himself, but to his wife and children.

A similar war occurred in Canada about twenty-five years ago. Liberal Catholics fear that this contest will break up the church before it will break up the liberal party. In the former contest the church got the upper hand. The parliament adopted a law, a copy of an English act, prohibiting the use of spiritual influence at elections. The clergy refused to recognize the right of parliament to pass such a statute and refused to obey it. The Supreme Court of Canada sustained the statute, however, and the Pope sent over Archbishop Conroy, a venerable and distinguished man, to arrange a compromise.

The present fight is on the same lines, and has grown out of the school question. In Manitoba the trouble has been practically settled by allowing the clergy of all denominations to enter the schools for one hour a day, three days of the week, to give religious instruction.

The liberal party is much stronger now than it was during the former contest, which is largely due to the influence of the French Canadians in New England, who number between 300,000 and 400,000, and are constantly going and coming between the United States and Canada. Every French Canadian in the United States is a liberal, and there are fifteen liberal newspapers in New England, which are circulated by the carload in Canada. The independence and freedom enjoyed by the French Canadians in New England has led them to demand the same rights and liberties in Canada. The church has very much less power on this side of the border, and the French Canadians who have lived for any time in the United States decline to obey the Canadian priests as they did formerly.

It is the same old story of Romish intermeddling in politics, always with the same intent, which is not the interests of the people, nor the furtherance of the principles of popular liberty and mental and religious freedom, but solely the strengthening of the power of the Romish hierarchy. In truth Rome is a political organization, instead of being in any proper sense a church or religious fraternity.

And yet, in a country where the spirit of freedom is alive, how these Jesuitical adherents of Romish politico-ecclesiasticism prate of their love for the principles of human liberty! But, in their hearts they mean always liberty bounded and circumscribed by Romish ideas and governed by priestly dictation.

True, generous human freedom, free from priestly rule and not subject to the tactics of churchly coercion, Rome never wants nor will ever accept—except in Jesuitical way, that it may secretly undermine and destroy what it cannot rule. X-RAY.

WITH HIS OWN RETARD.

To the Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, editor of the Outlook, it must have caused a shock of surprise to find himself shut out from the pious precincts of the Young Men's Christian Association of Philadelphia, where he proposed to deliver a lecture. It must have been especially painful to know that this action was explained by the statement that the association considers itself responsible for what takes place in its building, and its portals are barred to Dr. Abbott on account of recent utterances of his on the subject of the story of of Jonah and the Whale.

While this is an exhibition of intolerance such as The World cannot possibly approve, there is one circumstance which throws around it the atmosphere of poetical and retributive justice. Through the columns of the Outlook Dr. Abbott has warmly applauded and endorsed the very policy of exclusion and intolerance of which he has been made the victim. The World would like to believe that this little dose of his own medicine may serve to cure the Doctor of his intolerance and lead him into the ways of peace and liberalism.—New York World.

FROM TWO WORLDS

THE PHYSICAL ORGANIZATION is an evolution of the objective concrete, and tangible, from the subjective, causative, sublimate, and ethereal. The experiences of life tend to arouse the mental, liberate the spirit, and enable it to express its innate powers.

THE HIGHER MAN EVOLVES the less capable are the physical senses to take cognizance of, and register, his activities; but a higher range of transcendental powers, and realms of activity adapted thereto, have awakened his latent consciousness from sensuous lethargy, and these intuitive faculties correspond as the blossom to the bud, compared with man's primitive material powers, and their radiance is likened unto the perfume of the rose in full bloom.

GAL FORTY—EIGHT

MATERIALIZATION IS EFFECTED by the exercise of knowledge acquired, firstly, in the earth life; secondly, in spirit life, by communication with and through earthly surroundings. Occasionally spirits meet with persons of distinct physical and magnetic constitutions, who shed an emanation of vital magentism, or the superfine particles of material substances, infinitesimally small, yet possessed of distinctive qualities and potencies, by which the various phases of these phenomena can be produced.

MAN MAY, BY DILIGENT STUDY, and self-culture, exercise the same capability as a disembodied spirit, even in the direction of materialization, overcome the physical impediments, leave the body, and travel to distant regions previously unknown, and find practically unlimited scope for the exercise of his spiritual energies.

THE SPIRIT BY EXERCISING its will and creative abilities, can ments to fulfill its desires with much more exactitude and delicacy than any of the most finished work of master minds on earth. The flowers thus evolved, the beautiful panoramas, and sculpture perfectly representing the wish and the thought and fancy of the thinker. The very garments are embodiments of thought—good, bad, or indifferent, and hopes, aspirations, and wishes urged into motives leave their indelible impress therein.

We would call the attention of the aldermen of Chicago, to the following list of meetings held in this city. Joys Beyond the Threshold

A SEQUEL TO

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled in the bosom of etherial space. "BEYOND THE THRESHOLD" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy; claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. VOLNEY'S RUINS

—AND—

THE LAW OF NATURE,

TO WHICH IS ADDED

Volney's Answer to Dr. Priestly, a Biographical Notice by Count Daru, and the Zodiacal Signs and Constellations by the Editor;

Also, a Map of the Astrological Heavens o the Ancients.

Printed on heavy paper, from new plates, in large, clear type, with portrait and illustrations. One vol., post 8vo, 248 pages; paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This is undoubtedly one of the best and most useful books ever published. It eloquently advocates the best interests of mankind, and clearly points out the sources of human ignorance and misery. The author is supposed to meet in the ruins of Palmyra an apparition or phantom, which explains the true principles of society, and the causes of both the prosperity and the ruin of ancient states. A general assembly of the nations is at length convened, a legislative body formed, the source and origin of religion, of government, and of laws discussed, and the Law of Nature—founded on justice and equity—is finally proclaimed to an expectant world.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

—OR—

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

Together with Portraits, Letters and Poems. Illustrated with Engravings and Frontispiece of Lincoln, from Carpenter's Potrait from Life.

It breathes forgotten whispers which the rust of time had almost covered, and which have been snatched from the very jaws of oblivion. It deals with high official private life during the most momentous period in American History, and is a secret page from the life of him whom time serves only to make greater, more appreciated, and more understood—"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

Primitive Christianity. Volume I. Containing the lost lives of Jesus Christ and the Apostles. Showing the dawn of Christianity in Jesus Christ, its destruction by martyrdom and suppression, the falsification of the Bible by forgery, and the authentic Gospel of St. John. With engravings of St. John, Christ and John the Baptist. Published by Joseph Rodes Buchanan.

This is a volume that will excite much interest. It is the result of sixty years' labor by one who has proved an original explorer of Nature, and whose work in fields of original research has established a department of science before unknown. By means of the science of psychometry he claims to have obtained a knowledge of the character of the Apostles and Christ, and presents to the world this record, as the complete revelation of Christianity as it was in its primitive purity.

The wide variation between the primitive Christianity of Christ and the Apostles and the Christianity of the churches to-day, in doctrine and in practice, is set forth clearly. The church of to-day is shown to be based upon the forged canonical gospels. The four evangelists had nothing to do with the production of the gospels of the New Testament. The church was founded in fraud, in defiance of the true principles of Christianity.

The objective intent of the book may be gathered from this sentence:

"The cunning ferocity that murdered him and his apostles, suppressed or distorted all their honest writings, concealed their true history, and organized with political and military power the entire mass of ancient superstitions which he was overturning, into a church sanctified by his name feloniously assumed, should inspire every lover of justice and truth to rally to the standard of this noble martyr and listen to his teaching now rescued from oblivion and hideous distortion."

Karezza. Ethics of Marriage. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D., Author of Tokology, Koradine, Health Germs.

This little book elucidates a theory of conjugal life in which there is a love communion between husband and wife, from which results a mastery of the physical and complete control of the fecundating power, and shows that from such mastery the highest happiness and greatest physical, mental and spiritual good is attained and conserved. In every respect this book is worthy of highest commendation. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Philosophy of Phenomena. By Geo. M. Ramsey, M. D. Boston: Banner of Light Publishing Company.

The author considers his subject under two general heads: Metaphysical Phenomena and Physical Phenomena. His style of treatment is sententious, sparkling, thoughtful, philosophic and yet entertaining. It is adapted to the ordinary reader's comprehension, clothing deep and abstruse thoughts in plain every-day language. The wise and the unwise, the learned and the unlearned, will find entertainment and instruction in his crisp, bright presentation of his views; and no reader can follow him without a feeling of pleasure and satisfaction. It is a good book for the Spiritualist's library. Cloth, 208 pages.

AN EARNEST APPEAL FOR HELP.

To all whom it may concern: F. L. Hughes, of Wheatland, Hillsdale county, Mich., was convicted of assault and battery in the circuit court of that county on complaint of one of a party who raided a seance in Hughes' house.

Hughes appealed to the Michigan State Spiritual Association for aid in taking the case to the supreme court, and a partial fund was raised at the mid-winter convention.

From the transcript of the case, it appears to the satisfaction of the M. S. S. A. Board and its counsel that the trial was unfair; that the verdict got by admitting evidence against the medium who was not on trial; by playing on the prejudice of the jury against Spiritualism; the admission of totally irrelevant evidence; and improper argument by the counsel; that no assault was made by Hughes or proven against him; and that the raid on the seance and subsequent prosecution was the result of a conspiracy to persecute Mr. Hughes on account of his belief in Spiritualism. If allowed to succeed it establishes a precedent dangerous to the liberty of all Spiritualists. We need and must have more funds to assist Mr. Hughes who is a poor man and unable to bear the entire expense of his litigation in which we should all be interested. We therefore issue this appeal pursuant to the following resolutions adopted by the board at Lansing, March 24th, 1897:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Board the Hughes case should be appealed to the supreme court, and that the president and secretary be instructed to make further effort to raise funds for that purpose.

Resolved, That when sufficient funds are raised the same is hereby appropriated for the purpose of taking such appeal.

Friends, if anything is done by you to help Mr. Hughes it must be done at once, as the court gives him until April 14th only to decide whether he will appeal this case and decision depends upon the financial aid he receives from the friends of Spiritualism. All funds are to be sent to the secretary.

WHY GIVE UP HOPE?

IF OTHERS ARE CURED, WHY NOT YOU!

More proof of his power to diagnose: Dr. C. E. Watkins—Dear Sir:—I received your diagnosis of case No. 4087, Nettie Fleming, and as far as I know, it agrees in every particular with that of three other physicians, but I am very sorry to say that there is no use in doing any more; she is sinking rapidly, and may pass away at any moment. Doctor your kind, unselfish, noble act has saved me from death— and that worse than death—destruction of manhood, and put me on the upward course. My wife appreciates all you have done for me as much as I—and although we don't know you personally, we think of you as a noble friend to our family. We have been blessed with another child. My wife, before it was born, told me if it was a boy it had to be named after you. Now will you tell us what your initials stand for. Please send us your full name, so we can name the baby. Yours ever,

Showing that he can diagnose disease three thousand miles away, as well as if he saw the patient:

Dr. C. E. Watkins—Dear Sir:—Allow me to thank you very kindly for the diagnose of my case. Before your letter reached me, I began treating with one of our physicians, whose diagnosis agrees in every particular with that of yours. Should these remedies prove ineffectual, I shall gladly enlist myself as one of your patients. Again thanking you for your interest, I am very respectfully yours, of all diseases that flesh is heir to, and will give you proof of her powers, by sending requirements as per small advertisement for diagnosis of your case. Here is one of her many cures:

St. Louis, June 21, 1896.
MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.
With affectionate regards, very truly,

WORK IN OHIO.

OHIO STATE ORGANIZATION—GOOD WORK BEING DONE.

To the Editor:—Since the opening of the campaign for State organization in Ohio, March 1st, there has been a steady increase to the interest favoring such organic action. The workers in the cause throughout the State have taken up the work in a systematic and zealous manner. Mass-meetings have been held in Columbus, Canton, Springfield, Cleveland and Geneva. Everywhere the halls have been packed with crowds of investigating people desiring to gather more of the truths of Spiritualism.

At Cincinnati, April 17 and 18th, a big mass-meeting will be held. Prominent speakers and mediums will be present, and an effort will be made to bring out the same spiritual enthusiasm that used to charactrize the meetings held in that city several years ago. Local societies are requested to appoint delegates for the State Convention to be held in Columbus about the first of May. One delegate to every twenty-five members or fraction thereof is allowed. In communities where there is no society the Spiritualists can create a temporary organization, appoint delegates, and after the State Convention can further create their society by the aid of the State Association, through its bureau of speakers and mediums. Special rates on railroads are expected, and an effort is being made by the Columbus society to entertain the delegates.

If Societies or committees desiring speakers for dates in April, on the extraordinary terms—traveling expenses and collections, will send in their applications at once, so that dates can be arranged, such talent as Hon L. V. Moulton, Moses Hull, W. J. Hull, and Maggie Gaule will be furnished. Ere two more moons have come and gone, Ohio will have a State association that will reflect credit to the cause universally and render much good specifically.

PASSED TO SPIRIT-LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free.]

Mr. Jacob Pfeifer, who has been a true, devoted Spiritualist for many years, passed to higher life, from his home at Durhamville, N. Y., March 27, 1897, at the age of 82 years.
WM. BEGGS.

On the afternoon of January 22, Sister Mary E. Watson, of Jonesboro, Ark., was born into spirit-life. Sister Mary was the genial and loving conjugal mate of Bro. B. F. Watson. She was an honest and sincere medium, and within the sacred precincts of her hospitable home convinced many who wandered in superstition's darkness, of the reality of a future life, and the necessity of improving the present one by leading an unselfish and blameless career. Her phase was rapping and independent slate-writing, and all who asked for light at her hand were served cheerfully without compensation. WARREN SMITH.

John B. Miller, aged 57 years, passed to the higher life, March 7, from his home near South Haven, Mich. His death was the result of an accident sustained while trimming peach trees. Funeral services were conducted by Mrs. A. C. Woodruff, assisted by Mrs. Levi Wood. MRS. C. MILLER.

Passed to spirit-life, from her home in Searsmont, Me., Mrs. Abba Morse, aged 73 years and 8 months. She was one of the early pioneers, and for thirty-eight years held up the banner of Spiritualism, ever willing to do the bidding of the angel world. She has spoken words of comfort and consolation to the mourners at over two thousand funerals. The funeral services were given through inspiration by Mrs. M. J. Wentworth, of Knox, who spoke beautiful words in loving remembrance of the arisen one. MRS. L. D. SHOREY.

John M. Gay, aged 52 years, a soldier in the late war, and Spiritualist for many years, was born into the higher life, March 13, at his home in Flint, Mich. His wife and one son are left in the home, knowing well that the veil is thin that separates him from them. Hon. L. V. Moulton, of Grand Rapids, conducted the funeral services. The burial service was read by the G. A. R. Post, of which deceased was a member.
EFFIE M. POST.

Mrs. Mary J. Norman, of 112 South Peoria street, Chicago, passed to spirit-life, March 29, 1897, at the age of 74 years and three days. She was born in Richmond, Ind., and for many years had been a Spiritualist. Appropriate services were conducted at the residence on the following Wednesday by Mrs. M. Summers, pastor of the Spiritualistic Church of the Students of Nature, at 1052 Milwaukee avenue, and Rev. M. E. Hulbert, of Kirkland Mission, 111 South Halsted street. The remains were taken to Aurora, Ill., for burial.

The Progressive Thinker

VOL. 15. CHICAGO, ILL., SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1897, NO. 386.

The Progressive Thinker Joins in the Celebration of the Forty-Ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism.

THE CHURCH OF THE SOUL DULY CELEBRATES THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM, AND MANY THOUGHTS ARE GIVEN WHICH LEAD THE MIND TO A HIGHER AND GRANDER PLANE—A LECTURE GIVEN BY MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND.

INVOCATION.

Infinite Spirit, life of all light; Infinite Soul, supreme and eternal, at the altar of truth we praise Thee. Within the charmed silence that abides with thee thy children bend, yet ever mindful that the universe of physical life is vocal with rejoicing; that springtime brings its ever recurrent beauties with bird and blossom; and sweet sound of winds and waters ever declare the glad rebirth, that rebirth that is like unto the manifestations of the soul, making ever more and more perfect attestation of the life within and above. So do we praise in approaching the shrine of nature, that this day and hour upon the earth, death is set at naught and the message of life stands revealed, revealed to those who will receive it, and ready for those who understand; and that life itself is but a continuous change evermore pointing to added and diviner perfection. May all who sorrow because of death remember the greater beauty of life. May all who mourn in the outer world, who have not knowledge of that which is beyond, find comfort in ministering presences, and may such as scoff and sneer and do not understand the great revealment that is at their doors, still find comfort in its presence, for even though the light shineth not into darkened ways of human life, the light is there and affects the atmosphere. May all who turn toward the light find abundant evidence to lead them on, and may such as are in possession of its wondrous truth and beauty gain added knowledge, so that from height to height there is the attestation of the power of the spirit. May those rejoice who have conquered death and the fear of death, who have bridged over the chasm that lies between them and their loved ones; may they know that these are but the stepping stones unto that eternal life that is ever and ever abiding. Amen.

DISCOURSE.

The ever recurrent springtime brings ever recurrent cause for rejoicing, and although the heralds of the spring are scarcely here in this northern latitude one robin may have declared it; a few blossoms may have whispered it, and the winds take on a less sharp and boreal edge because of the summertime that is coming. And you are always glad when it appears. It is the time for the sowing of the seed, for the planting of the garden, for the pruning of the fruit trees and the vines, and the earth in her turn makes ready for this glad acclaim.

This is why we may acclaim concerning Spiritualism. No longer new, yet it is forever to be declared; no longer something to be proven, yet there are thousands and millions who do not know of it; no longer as a fact possible of disputation with those who keep pace with the facts and record of facts of the age and the truth that is in the world, still there are a great many on the border land of that truth; a great many outside of the range of those facts, and a great many who refuse to turn thither even now. Yet while this ever recurrent season of rejoicing must be attested, must be declared, must be noted, we must never forget that in the modern presentation this theme had its beginning in those small sounds that were the signal for the voice of the spirit-world, and those ministrations coming through childish lips were the announcement of a great truth that the world was yearning to hear.

We still have somewhat of another view to present this night. The old, true statement will be declared from hundreds of rostrums today; little children will have learned it, and in Lyceum and in Sunday-school you will know the cause of this rejoicing; flowers and garlands and songs will tell of it, and the people will know, who care to know, that Spiritualism celebrates its Forty-ninth Anniversay.

Before another half century it is quite likely that there will not be a person in all the enlightened world that will not know of the existence of Spiritualism, though possibly there may not be those who will question it—that is whose intelligence and whose daily walk is of any value apparently to human life; and within another half century there may be edifices, schools, institutions, means of experimenting and investigation added to what is already known. All this is possible, but it is just as true that because Spiritualism has announced thus much concerning the spiritual nature of man and the existence beyond the grave and the proof of communion between the two worlds, that it also opens up other vast fields of inquiry and one cannot pause there. Those do not need to learn it over and over again. Although they enjoy the communion, they appreciate the ministration, but the knowledge of a future life should be so engraven and engrafted on the minds of all Spiritualists that they need no added proof at this hour. Yet it is quite amazing that whether in public audience, in private seance; whether spoken from the platform or given on the slate, Spiritualists as a rule are as anxious to receive—shall we call it a test? No, we will not insult them if they are as anxious to receive a test as they seem to be, so we suppose the secret of their being anxious is to receive a message; yet if it is marvelous they will turn smilingly to their next neighbor and say: "Oh, what a splendid test!" as though they needed it.

FORTY OR FORTY-FIVE YEARS ago they had the clouds riven, acknowledging the spirit communion, the tidings from the realm unseen, and if it was a fact then they knew it just as well as they do to-day. The sweetest ministration does not often come in that way, nor do communications such as friends would give to friends; but it is valuable to those who have not made inquiry.

All these years have wrought another message and have brought a greater change. With knowledge concerning the spirit of man it opens up, not only the ancient inquiry, but the inquiry of all time as to the soul of man, its state before, its state now, its state hereafter, and Spiritualism certainly cannot be a finality in the presentation of the next stage of existence only. Albeit, we are fully aware that that next stage is the one in which most human beings on the earth to-day are most interested; that that next stage is the next step, and if that is solved most of the fear, all of the doubt, and indeed everything that troubles the human race concerning the immediate future will be cleared away. But do not think that humanity is satisfied with this.

DOUBTING STAGES.

There are plenty of people in the world who have never doubted immortality; there are plenty of people in the world who have passed through their doubting stages, have heard the teachings in past expressions and are ready for what Spiritualism implies in its larger meaning, for the other open avenues that it may lead to, for whatever it heralds, since neither human life nor the next stage beyond can be a finality, and it is that other thing that Spiritualism heralds, that larger something, of which it is the preparation, that we are about to speak.

The whole world makes ready

of some sort; religion in its various denominational lines is making ready for it, and there are many distinct prophets among those who declare the new dispensation, the second coming of Christ. The computation, mathematically and theologically, has been made that that coming is imminent, that it is now here.

Many periods of time have gone by in which this prediction was to have been verified, but it has not been literally, so far as human beings know. Yet all this which is in the air indicates that there is something, and Spiritualists do well that they heed this indication, because while pursuing a single line of fact they may lose sight altogether of the large truth that the fact implies. Many people often are so busy with one special line of life and some particular daily occupation that is needed that they forget the larger necessities and emergencies that existence in fact implies and conveys.

So it is that this truth having settled the fact of a future existence many people trouble nothing about it any further. If they get a message from the other world, it is well; they seek a message oftentimes, but they think there is nothing more to be done, that the question is settled. Having and the still greater tortures of a limited heaven, they believe they have nothing more to learn, nothing more to do; and these are the people that for forty years have enjoyed this ministration, this communion and still have not touched hands in sympathy with the great movements that are going on in the world all around them.

SIGNS OF THIS INCOMING TIDE, of this something, that is beyond, are heralded all around and about them and they pay no attention to it; but they are here, and the announcement that we have made repeatedly from the pulpit of this church, or wherever we have spoken to this congregation, must be repeated tonight: That Spiritualism is the herald of the great truth that is in the upper air; that if Spiritualism cannot enlarge its domain to include it, it will include Spiritualism in its domain. That light, that knowledge relates to something more than the immediate stage of existence beyond the earth.

Let us repeat again what we said but a few moments ago: That as it is much to know of a future state, it is great to know that death is abolished, that it does not end all, and that there is intercommunion between the two worlds. It makes an entire change in the ethical and theological thought of the age. It changes the past with reference to the change called death, and with reference to the states of the spirit in the hereafter. It sets at naught, being proven, the theories of theology, that claim that there can be no knowledge concerning the future state, and that the states of futurity are final and limited and in one condition, either of darkness or of light.

In fact, the entering wedge of the opens up anew and re-arranges the whole proposition concerning the future life, and this re-arrangement has taken place not only among Spiritualists as a body, not only individually and collectively, but among all kinds of worshipers. No theology in the world today but is affected by it. There is a different statement, there is a different perception, and while much of the ritual and much of the denominational creed remains the same in the books and on the records, the clergymen do not preach denominational theology; they preach the religion that is in the air; they preach the religion that is in the world, and Spiritualism impinges upon them in their place as it does upon those who avow it, and sometimes we think their minds are better impressed by it than if they occupied themselves too much with the details of intercommunion and mediumship.

A great many clergymen preach Spiritualism; that is, if Spiritualism means a future state; if Spiritualism means the intercommunion between the two worlds; if Spiritualism means the knowledge of that intercommunion daily; if Spiritualism means the changes that may come to the spirit after death. All this is preached from the pulpit, not only from Unitarian and Universalists pulpits, but other pulpits throughout the world.

Then there has been a general spiritualizing going on besides. Something that does not seem to be born of the phenomenal part of Spiritualism, but is the impelling force behind it, for say what you will of the phenomena, attest them as you will, great care is taken on the part of the spirit world that the phenomena shall not exceed the philosophy; that the knowledge of the fact does not take the place of the knowledge of what it means.

Hence,

SOMETIMES A VEIL OF DOUBT

is thrown over the phenomenal phases in their particular expression for the purpose of arousing this inquiry as to what the fact may mean, if true. This is why scientific bodies, as a rule, have made little progress in the investigation of phenomenal Spiritualism, for the simple reason that the fact implies more and a different basis and standpoint than they are willing the accept. They approach the subject a priori, presuming that there is nothing but phenomena produced by causes that are in the usual and ordinary realm of nature, namely, unintelligent but acting laws. To their utter discomfiture they find no such methods governing the phenomena of Spiritualism, and the scientist who approaches the investigation with the thought that he is to reduce the phenomena to a possible demonstration, either with or without the accepted theory as to its cause, finds himself utterly at sea. He can investigate scientifically, but he cannot make a science of what he investigates unless he includes the whole proposition. If he refuses to include the whole proposition, which means the same circumstances: tables will not move under apparently the same conditions; raps will not come with the same medium or psychic and apparently the same condition, yet under more unfavorable conditions all these things will appear, showing that the power of intelligence behind is that precisely which baffles the ordinary investigator.

Therefore, the facts of Spiritualism phenomenally will not be accepted as conclusive, until the theory, until the teaching, until the

is also accepted. That the source of the manifestation is spiritual, is intelligent, is in fact what it claims to be—beings who have lived upon earth and are in a state of spirit existence beyond the change called death. We say much has been accomplished, a revolution has been wrought in this way, and if it were possible by some psychic or spiritual process for you to trace the cause of these changes you would find that they are largely due to that which you call Modern Spiritualism. That the revolution has been wrought silently and not by name makes it none the less true and none the less valuable; but because Spiritualism has gone forward, has announced its theme, has given its manifestation and its teaching, many have thought that there was nothing else in connection with it, nothing more to follow.

ALONG THIS BORDER LAND

which is now occupied by theosophy and christian science, and many other occult themes, is the suggestion of that other something that Spiritualism is the herald of. A great open doorway unto the soul; a step toward the revealment of all that man can know concerning the past and the future and that eternity that is neither past nor future, and because of this impinging larger subject many are not attracted to Spiritualism in its phenomenal phase. The phase that is more frequently presented by the one anxious to make converts than any other; and because of this larger theme it breaks out in many forms of inspiration that may not be wholly included in what is usually termed Spiritualism.

It is true that the Spiritualist has more knowledge of spiritual healing than possibly the christian scientist can comprehend, and it is also true that in any realm of psychical investigation the phenomena which are brought before the world as the result of recent investigation were familiar to Spiritualists a quarter of a century or even forty years ago, and nothing can be brought forward that has not already transpired within their knowledge. But in the realm of what is called speculative philosophy, or that deeper realm of real intuitive knowledge that is to form the great religious outgrowth, that is the basis of it as well as the source of it, Spiritualists, as a rule have not given heed to that which is manifest; and as a rule they have turned away from any religious interpretation whatever, many of them thinking that this is to be a science and not even a philosophy, while others accredit to it the term philosophy, meaning, however, not that which is essentially religious.

On the other hand, it is just as true as any other fact of human history that periods of religious must appear; that have their inspiration and their stamp and their culmination, and then recede because of the lack of inspiration in their followers; and it is true that these waves of inspiration and religious truth are always accompanied, heralded and followed by manifestations, that the prophets and seers have gifts of the spirit; that those who form the culminations of religious periods have gifts of the spirit in greater power, and that their disciples and followers have gifts of the spirit, and that these gifts of the spirit, or manifestations, are the accompaniments of a new announcement of truth, of a restatement of the primal truth, and of the re-arrangement of thought in the world in a given direction.

Spiritualism has already given indication of this and the statement that Spiritualism is the herald of by no means is an under-valuation of what Spiritualism is. Many may think there are no ramifications of human thought into which it can not lead, but if the soul is greater than the spirit, then the term Spiritualism will only apply to that which relates to spirit, per se, and its manifestation in this world and the next, and this is generally the accredited meaning of the term; while all that realm that relates to soul, to the new manifestation of truth in the world in the highest spiritual sense, is overlooked.

You cannot make a religious truth of an external manifestation. The church has tried to do this many times and failed. All religions have tried to do it and have failed. Spiritualists have tried, many of them, and many of them have failed. The great truth under-lying it, that which is its life and its birth and its motive and incentive, is the presentation to such as need the knowledge of the future state, the doing away with mourning and with terror concerning a future life, for the purpose of preparing the way on earth for the added light. We have been telling you, who were our congregation for these many years, that this added light is so pressing and pushing upon human life to-day that there are many lives prepared for its reception; that there are in all parts of the world those who are made ready, and that not necessarily in connection with the outward manifestation of Spiritualism will this be wholly known, although necessarily it will be more largely known in that connection than any other; but that this new light is to take up those fields of inquiry, those realms of thought, those added and higher teachings that you have been familiar with, and bear them forward to the announcement of the new truth for which Spiritualism is the herald.

It was said, you know, that among the Jews they thought that John the Baptist might be the Christ for whom they were looking; but he denied this, and Jesus was recognized by him as the true Christ. So it may be said of many another movement, that the herald of the movement was not the movement itself, but only the outlying skirmishing army that prepared the way for the great forces of spiritual truth to follow. Something is this, when a few clouds start across the eastern horizon and are tinted with the rays of the thing that is to be, when at last the whole sky becomes luminous and armies of clouds appear with wonderful resplendent banners of glory, and then at last all at once the full tide comes and the full splendor of the day appears; and the king of day triumphant claims entire possession. So it is with the dawning of truth. The first clouds of glory, the winged messengers that are at your doors, bring the knowledge of communion between the two worlds, those babes lisping to you the consciousness that they have not died; those messengers that interpret to you the future existence because of the larger message that is to follow.

It is not true that there could be any glory in a spirit message if there were no added realm beyond that realm into which the spirit passes with death, any more than it could be true that the morning splendor would be reflected on the clouds unless the morning were to follow; and it could not be true that so many in the world to-day are expectant for the new light, for the larger truth, for the perfect solution of human difficulties and problems, unless that problem were solved in the higher realms beyond.

It limits the possibility of spiritual knowledge for people to say: "Oh! yes, but spirits do not know any more than we do." They do. They know one thing that you do not in your present consciousness, that you cannot know until you pass through the change called death. Many spirits may not know of other subjects as much as you, or of different regions and realms of thought, but that one experience that you are to express in this form, as you may have in others, but were not conscious of it, must vary with the degree of intelligence. Just as the interpretation of human existence varies with the degree of intelligence,

One man thinks life is for a certain purpose. If he is a clod he associates with the clod; if he is an artist he associates with the lovers of art; if he is a poet he makes rhymes and poetry. If he is a philanthropist he associates it with works of this kind. So spirit existence is interpreted differently by different spirits according to their state, and you must bear in mind that if Spiritualism offers you no general or particular statement concerning a future life and the habitation of the spirit-world, it is simply because every spirit declares according to his or her experience and according to his or her enlightenment; and as that life is not generic, but the flowering out of the human expression, so more particularly than human life is the spirit life and its interpretation dependent upon spiritual condition. But there can be no limit to that realm of knowledge of which that life and this life and all other human lives are but the vestibule. There can be no limit to that realm of knowledge that lies within and beyond in the realms of souls.

It is true that in that realm you may know more than a common communicating spirit, and when a spirit comes and says in a seance there is no such thing as another embodiment, that does not settle it, because there are not only a great many people here who would say so, but there are a great many people who do not even know the meaning of the word embodiment (and if you are to depend upon human testimony as to what life is in a future state, as the skeptic does concerning Spiritualism then there is no human life, so varied are the opinions of humanity concerning it, and even events are witnessed, with such different states of mind, that they are almost capable of being reasoned out of existence, because of conflicting testimony. And when it comes, then, to the statement concerning what may or may not be true, spirits, unless the general enlightenment is adequate, may not know; yet those who do know and who can declare and who can make the statement and who can present it in such a light that human intelligence, if accustomed to mental action, can perceive it and state it. Those are capable, unquestionably, of teaching and do teach.

Then what is this light that Spiritualism is the herald of? What is this truth not included in the present and past religious teaching of christendom that is here? It is undeniably true that something has been lost from the primal proposition of christendom, from the primal proposition of the statement of religion in the past, and even if taught by Buddha not preserved in such form that they can be restated simply and clearly to modern understanding; at least those who have studied theosophy do not find the statement made clear in that direction: and those who read poems find that it is veiled too much in the poetic expression and imagery; while, perhaps, clearly perceived by the author, but not presentable as a statement or thesis.

What is this that is included and implied in the dispensation that is approaching?

IT IS THE ONE GOLDEN CHORD

and thread that has been lost in other religions, the chord and thread connecting the human life with an eternity. We do not mean an eternity beyond, nor behind merely, but an eternity that is complete, that is perfect, that is absolute. It is the one golden chord explaining the entity of the soul in its entirety. It is the one great theme of immortality talked about, but may be conditional in every system of religion as taught in the world to-day except this.

You can lose it somewhere in the Christian statement; you can lose it somewhere in the Theosophical statement; you can lose it somewhere in the Buddhistic statement, but immortality means immortality; that which it is not possible to lose, because if possible to lose it is not immortality. This one great longing in the human state proceeds from the one great knowledge within the soul. It is to bring this knowledge ever and ever to the surface, to bring it ever and ever to human consciousness as needed, as the ages are ripe for it, as the world is ready, that Spiritualism is here. It must be the herald; it cannot be the conclusion; it, by very necessity, cannot be the culmination; that which all the world seeks in various ways, that is all the world which is interested in this line of subjects, must be the one thing that is answered by it.

Now, those who declare the new Messiah are not exactly agreed as to what the New Messiah shall teach; those who declare the second coming of Christ are not exactly agreed as to what this shall mean; but all feel the pulsation of this mighty approach. Even the false Christs even the imitators, even those who are declaring themselves saviors beforehand. Twenty, thirty, within the last half century, more than a hundred that you could name if you would recall them, have said

"I AM THE MESSIAH."

Why should this thought be in the world? What is there to produce it? There is nothing in the world of commerce that leads a man from the board of trade to announce that he is the coming Christ. And the kind of egotism or insanity—and that kind of insanity is egotism, many kinds of insanity are—the kind of egotism and insanity that causes people to declare this is touched by the fact, touched by the actuality that is approaching. The false Christ could not be declared without the true; the false announcement of the dispensation unless there were a true; and even mathematical computations but prove that something where in the approaching tide, that is now near the earth, this light is really to be found.

It is no wonder that mathematics might err because the data are wrong. It is no wonder that prophets cannot see it, because time is not the principal factor in the announcement. The preparation, the making ready, is the principal factor; and all this demonstration of making ready, both by true and false means, are evident in the world at this hour. Making ready by signs and tokens that are real; making ready by signs and tokens that are fictitious; making ready by claims that are of the angels; making ready by claims that are of human egotism and weakness but making ready by the great winnowing wings of this mighty herald of life that is to reveal all things as the souls are ready. That which Christ could not because they could not hear it, the Comforter has come to declare, and that Comforter, in the light of modern Spiritualism, lifts the burden of sorrow, sets aside the veil between the two worlds, comforts the mourner, gives to the afflicted that which in turn shall make them more and more calm, and in some sense uplifts the burdens of life.

But the greater truth that lies beyond solves the meaning of the sorrow, the meaning of the problem, and shows that the way through the sorrow is by its victory, just as we have said before. You can neither go around, nor over it, nor under it, but through it: experiencing all the work that it is to produce in your lives, and thus making ready for the knowledge of why and wherefore it came.

IN THIS ADDED LIGHT

we give no time, no period. We know that many are anxious for us to declare whether it shall be next year or one hundred years, but certainly we will not since it is not the time of the coming, but the preparation, that is most needed. Were the Christ already here, which could not be before the time, you still would not be ready. Were the millennium here, which could not be before the time, you are not ready for the millennium.

The day of human brotherhood is put off, not because it is impossible, but because the world has not outgrown selfishness. You cannot bring by force that which

and when the new dispensation comes only those who are ready shall know. Perhaps as few as saw in Galilee the sign and token; perhaps as few as have seen in any dispensation the visible presence and understood its fullest

THE APPEARANCE TWENTY-FIVE YEARS AGO, OF THE HOUSE AT HYDESVILLE, N. Y., WHERE THE RAPS FIRST ORIGINATED.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., WITH GREAT ENTHUSIASM CELEBRATES THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ADVENT OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM.

49TH ANNIVERSARY.

ANNIVERSARY MEETING AT ROCHESTER, N. Y., MARCH 28—HISTORY OF THE RAPPINGS WHICH MADE THE FOX SISTERS FAMOUS, AND LAID THE FOUNDATION FOR THE PRESENT DOCTRINES.

The convention of the Spiritualists has an unusual amount of interest attached, from the fact that this city may be regarded as the birthplace of the modern doctrines, although it was not here, as is the general impression, that the famous Fox sisters had their first experience with the "rappings" for which they afterward became noted. It was in this city, however, that the first public demonstration was made.

Late in the fall of 1847, John Fox and his family moved from Rochester to Hydesville, a small hamlet near the town of Newark and made their home in the cottage which was the scene of the first experience with the rappings. It was December when they first occupied the house, and from the very first day the mysterious sounds were heard. They continued through the next two monthsand it became a source of great annoyance to the family. No mention was made to the neighbors of the trouble as it was feared that they would be ridiculed. The noises still continued, and the family who were devout church members continually prayed that they might be freed from the affliction.

On Friday evening, March 31, 1847, the members of the family had retired for the night when the noises were repeated. The youngest child, Kate, had become so accustomed to the sounds that she was no longer afraid and sat up in bed saying "Here, Mr. Splitfoot, do as I do," at the same time snapping her fingers. The "invisible rapper" immediately responded by rapping the same number of times that she snapped her fingers. The child repeated the performance several times and the rappings always corresponded to the number of times she had snapped her fingers. Finally, she made a number of motions without any noise, but the rappings were given corresponding to the number of movements she had made. Upon seeing this she cried out "Only look, mother, look, it can see as well as hear."

Her mother then entered the room and asked the "invisible" to count ten. Immediately there were ten raps given. Mrs. Fox then asked a number of questions relating to the age and number of her children, all of which were correctly answered. She then asked if the rappings would be given before the neighbors, and being answered in the affirmative summoned several of them and the questioning was repeated in their presence.

One of the questions as to the nature of the cause of the rappings received the answer that it was the spirit of a man who had been murdered in the house some years before. The matter was investigated and remains of a human being were found buried in the cellar. The story of the occurrences at the Fox cottage aroused great curiosity and it was thronged with visitors. In a short time strange stories were circulated and the family made very uncomfortable. The stories came to the ears of Mrs. Ann Leah Fish, another daughter of Mr. Fox, who was a resident of this city, and she made a visit to the cottage and after a careful investigation of the matter told her mother that it would be better for her to take Kate home with her and send Margaretta to stay with a friend in Auburn.

The trip was made by canal and Mrs. Fish was congratulating herself that the rappings had been left behind when they were heard on the floor of the cabin of the boat. They were also heard at the home of Mrs. Fish and several of the neighbors were summoned to listen to them. One of those summoned was Isaac Postman Quaker, and it was through his efforts that the alphabet was successfully used. After a number of meetings had been held at the home of Mrs. Fish the "invisibles" insisted that a public meeting be held. This was distasteful to the family and they opposed the spirits, who finally declared that they would leave the house unless their wishes in this matter were complied with. The rappings did cease after a time when nothing was done, and after they began to be missed it was some time before they could be induced to return. It was finally decided to hold a meeting as the spirits had requested and arrangements were made and November 14, 1849, was selected for the time and Corinthian hall as the place for the meeting.

Rev. A. H. Jervis, Nathaniel Draper, Lyman Granger, Amy Post, Sarah D. Fish and Mrs. Pierpont were selected by the spirits to appear on the platform with Mrs. Fish and her sister, Margaretta, the medium. Mrs. Post was further directed to sit by the medium, and to remain there constantly during any investigations which might take place. On the evening appointed for the meeting the hall was filled. All the parties named were on the platform, and an address was delivered by E. W. Capron, of Auburn. The closest attention was given to his remarks and at the close a committee of five prominent citizens was appointed to investigate the matter, and instructed to report on the rappings which had been heard during his address. The members of this committee which was selected by the audience were A. J. Combs, Daniel Marsh, Nathaniel Clark, A. Judson and Edward Jones.

On the evening upon which the committee was to render its report the hall was packed, and most of the audience were of the opinion that the matter would be fully explained and an end put to the "nine days' wonder." The committee made substantially the following report:

That without the knowledge of the persons in whose presence the manifestations are made, the committee selected the hall of the Sons of Temperance for investigation; that the sounds on the floor near where the two ladies stood were heard as distinctly as at other places, and that part of the committee heard the rapping on the wall behind them. A number of questions were asked, which were answered, not altogether right or altogether wrong. In the afternoon they went to the house of a citizen, and while there the sounds were heard on the outside (apparently) of the front door, after they had entered, and on the door of a closet. When the hand was placed upon the door a jar was sensibly felt when the rapping occurred. One of the committee placed one of his hands upon the feet of the ladies and the other on the floor, and though the feet were not moved there was a distinct jar on the floor. On the pavement and the ground the same sounds were heard. A kind of double rap, as a stroke and a rebound, were distinguishable. When the ladies were separated at a distance, no sound was heard; but when a third person was interposed between them the sounds were heard. The ladies seemed to give every opportunity to the committee to investigate the cause fully, and would submit to a thorough investigation by a committee of ladies if desired. All the members of the committee agreed in reporting that the sounds were heard, but they had failed to discover any means by which they were made.

The report was a disappointment to many of those present who had expected an exposure and they claimed that the matter had not been thoroughly investigated. Therefore, another committee consisting of the following gentlemen was appointed: Dr. H. H. Langworthy, Hon. Frederick Whittlesey, D. C. McCallum, William Fisher and Judge A. P. Hascall, of LeRoy. This investigation was conducted at the office of Chancellor Whittlesey, of the committee. Mrs. Fish and her sister Margaretta were placed in a number of different positions and every precaution taken to prevent deception, and as a result of the investigation it was the unanimous opinion of the committee that the sounds were "inexplicable."

So intense was the excitement that a third committee was appointed, among its members being two physicians. This committee was even more exacting in its tests, but were unable to discover the cause of the sound and when they reported their failure there was almost a riot. It had been anticipated that there would be trouble and the chief of police, S. D. W. Moore, had made arrangements for protecting the mediums. As it proved these precautions were necessary as the audience, carried away with excitment, made a determined rush for the platform, and it required the utmost efforts of the chief and his assistants to enable the ladies to be removed to a place of safety under guard.

From the time of these public meetings the doctrines of the Spiritualists have made considerable progress and they claim that at the present time the believers number 25,000,000. Among the prominent men who have been believers in their doctrines are Alexander Aksakoff, Robert Chambers, Hiram Corson, August De Morgan, J. W. Edmunds, Dr. Elliotson, I. H. von Fichte, Camille Flammarion, Hermann Goldschmidt, Dr. Hoffle, Robert Hare, Lord Lyndhurst, Robert and Robert Dale Owen, W. M. Thackeray, T. A. Trollope, Alfred Russel Wallace, Nicholas Wagner and Archbishop Whately.

The mass-meeting which opens this morning will consist of addresses by the leading members of the body and tests of various sorts will be made by a number of mediums. Several of the mediums have attracted wide attention by their seances and it is expected that the tests will be something out of the ordinary. If there is a sufficient attendance of local believers steps will be taken for perfecting a state organization. Arrangements will also be made for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the rappings of the Fox sisters which occurs next year. On Wednesday an excursion will be made to the Fox cottage at Hydesville.

The chief speakers and mediums at the present meeting will be Lyman C. Howe, Mrs. S. A. Armstrong, W. B. Mills, Mrs. A. Atcheson, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates.

ANNIVERSARY.

EXERCISES AT SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society of Springfield, Mass., celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism in a manner befitting the day, Wednesday, March 31st.

The speakers were Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, of Troy, N. Y., Mrs. H. G. Holcomb and W. H. Bach, of Springfield, and recitations were given by Mrs. Carol Marks, of New York City, and Master Lovel Smith, a member of our Lyceum.

The hall was elaborately decorated and Mrs. Vesper who had the decorations in charge deserves great credit for the same. Bunting was displayed in pleasing combinations while a profusion of natural and artificial flowers gave color and life to the scene. Directly over the speaker's head was a large artificial sunflower.

Music, vocal and instrumental was furnished by our own people. The Ladies' Aid Chorus of ten people furnished sweet spiritual music and during the day rendered an opening "Welcome Song" at both sessions, followed later by "Morn of Freedom," and closing the afternoon session with a benediction song, "Ministering Angels." The other selections were, "Something Sweet to Think of," "Are We forgotten When We're Gone," and the evening closing song, "Twilight." This music was in pleasing contrast to the old Gospel Hymns so often used.

Instrumental music was rendered by our pianist, Miss L. C. Magoon, as an overture at both sessions. Mandolin and piano duet by Mrs. Bach and Miss Maggon, and autoharp and mandolin duet by Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Bach. In the evening the Otro Mandolin Club, consisting of three mandolins, guitar and autoharp, and composed of members of the Spiritualist and Liberal societies, rendered "The Andalusia Waltz," "March Bohemia," "Waltz Gems," and "Spanish March."

The address of welcome was delivered by Mrs. H. G. Holcomb, and the anniversary address by the writer, while Mrs. Reynolds gave two very interesting talks and tests at each session. All of the speakers received hearty applause, and the recitation by Mrs. Marks, entitled "Her Creed," was repeated by request of the audience. Master Lovel Smith quite outdid himself in the "Roll Call."

The Ladies' Aid Society served a bountiful supper, and after enjoying it we adjourned to the hall where a Fact Meeting took place. Much interesting thought and facts were presented by our own people and by our visitors, some of whom came from adjacent States.

All of the services were well attended, the local press gave us long and respectful notices and everybody pronounced it a decided success. Perhaps we are a little conceited, but we think we had about as good an anniversary celebration as took place. W. H. BACH.

THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY.

The Spiritualistic Church of the Students of Nature at Munson Hall, 1052 Milwaukee Avenue, Chicago, remembered the origin of Modern Spiritualism, showing its appreciation of this great boon to humanity by extra services on Sunday evening, March 29. The hall was filled with an intelligent and appreciative audience. Many beautiful flowers were used in decoration. The children gave their little recitations and appropriate discourses were delivered by the Pastor. Mrs. M. Summers and others. W. D. SCHUMACHER.

ANNIVERSARY AT THAT NOTED PLACE—FIRST PUBLIC MEETING EVER HELD THERE AT THE HOME OF THE FOX SISTERS—A BAND OF FIFTY SPIRITUALISTS GO THE WAYNE COUNTY MECCA—THE CEREMONIES OF THE DAY—MANIFESTATIONS OF SPIRITS—REVISED REPORT FOR THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

Newark, March 31.—Over fifty Spiritualists who had been attending the three days' convention at Rochester arrived in Newark on the 9:07 Central-Hudson train this morning, bent on paying a visit to the famous Fox house in Hydesville, where Spiritualism originated March 31, 1848. The company was composed of all kinds of people. There was the old man with gray beard and feeble step, the young man with loud tie and cigarette, the old lady with a whole dictionary desiring to be expressed and the young lady with camera all loaded.

Liveryman Chapman was on hand with carryall and carriages, but many preferred to walk. As the strangers stepped from the train they stopped and held a council, after which all eyes were turned toward the Mecca of Spiritualism, which was soon reached.

Among those in the company were the following: Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, inspirational speaker; Professor W. M. Lockwood, of Chicago, scientific speaker; Mrs. S. Augusta Armstrong, of Buffalo, a woman suffragist as well as a Spiritualist medium; Mrs. A. Atcheson, of Buffalo, vice-president of the First Spiritualistic Church, of that city; Dr. Kates, of Philadelphia, who started the movement for the convention which was held in Rochester this week, and his wife, Mrs. Zaida Kates, who is a trance speaker; A. K. Sisson, president of the First Spiritualistic Church, of Rochester, and Mrs. R. H. Joslyn, vice-president; Mrs. Simmons, of Buffalo; Mrs. Van Buskirk, of Buffalo; Mrs. Bingham, of Rochester, inspirational speaker; Dr. Eddy, of Rochester; Mrs. Nugent, of Buffalo; E. C. Galusha, Mrs. Howe, Mrs. Dr. Parkhurst, Misses Ida Sisson and Neta Hawley, A. S. Clarkson, Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Christiance, all of Rochester; Mrs. Smiley and daughter Gena, of Andover, O.; Mrs. L. P. Fullom, Mrs. Dudley Palmer, G. E. Jones, Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. L. Farnsworth, Miss E. Shafer, Mrs. C. A. M. Simpson, Samuel Farnsworth, Mrs. Farnsworth, Mrs. J. L. Wilson, Mrs. A. J. Palmer, of Rochester; Mrs. E. J. Wilkinson, of Honeoye Falls; John Coolidge, Mary Coolidge, Mrs. Burdick, of Phelps; and Mrs. James R. Sanford, of Newark, a niece of the Fox sisters.

As soon as the company of Spiritualists had taken possession of the old house, William Hyde, the present owner, had a stove put up and some school house benches brought in. Soon all was warm and cozy and a general air of sociability prevailed. A goodly number of curiosity seekers from Newark were present.

G. W. Kates, of Philadelphia, arose as soon as all had arrived and announced that there had been no cut and dried program arranged. He said that those present believed in the spirit world and that they would hope to have something interesting to say as the spirit moved. "Nearer My God to Thee" was then sung in chorus after which Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, was introduced. He is a tall, spare, man with full beard and a peculiar expression about the eyes. He arose slowly and said that the spirits do not "come and go at our bidding;" but at just this time his hands went together with a resounding whack and he fell into spiritual guidance. For about ten minutes he seemed to be in a trance and talked as if inspired, and finally sat down at another whack together of his hands, the spirit having evidently taken its departure as suddenly as it appeared.

Interesting remarks were made by Mrs. E. Nugent of Buffalo, and Mrs. Dr. Parkhurst of Rochester.

Dr. Kates arose again and told what Spiritualists did not claim, did not do, did not think, etc. He recounted some of the stories about the Fox sisters and the rappings of nearly a half century ago and called upon George H. Pierson, of Newark, who lived in the vicinity of the Foxes at the time, to enlighten those present with any information he might have. Mr. Pierson said that he was not present when the cellar was dug into to find the remains of a peddler who is said to have been murdered. But he had heard that a body had been buried there. He had himself heard rappings in the Fox house when one of the girls had been in the room where the noises were heard.

At this point in the proceedings the chairman stated that there might be those who would like to see some material manifestations of the spirit. Accordingly four ladies and two gentlemen sat down to a table upon which their hands were placed. Then the song, "Let the Good Spirits Come In," was taken up, and soon Mrs. James R. Sanford, or Newark, one of the ladies at the table, began to pound the table with her hands as if frantic. "Let me have a pencil, let me have a pencil!" she cried. The pencil was immediately forthcoming, and then she began to write on paper under the control of the spirit, who part of the time would make her write like a court reporter, and the rest of the time like a country justice of the peace. All eyes were turned to the medium, and when the spirit had left her these words were found:

Good People: I am with you to-day. I will enlighten you all I can, for I am the spirit of one gone that you all know. While on earth I prayed for development to be made that might prove the truths you must know that are true. Work for this cause, loved ones. I am with you all, my dear friends, in my spirit. A. L. UNDERHILL.

The signature is that of Ann Leah Fox, the oldest daughter of the Fox family. Mrs. Sanford took another message as follows:

My spirit cannot tell all I would like to say. Never was I so happy to think the cause that must be brought forth must come to light. Our dear ones on earth must know that their departed ones have not gone to a world of everlasting death. But a communication must be given to the living to let them know we are with each one to-day. And many are the things we would like to tell you all. Each person here has a loving spirit gone to the other world, and they all want to say something. So it is very hard to control a medium intellectually. However, we must say something that will let you know as a fact that we are all with you to celebrate this anniversary of Spiritualism. I am a spirit, and one that you will all be glad to know, that enjoys a spiritual belief in the other world. You know the spirit of

HORACE GREELEY.

Mrs. Sanford, the medium taking these messages, is the daughter of David Fox, of Newark, a brother of the famous Fox sisters. Her name is Leah Fox Sanford. Here the exercises of the morning ended and the Spiritualists became materialists by enjoying basket lunches, which were discussed with great relish.

In the afternoon brief exercises were held in the open air, but the air was so raw that they were ended very shortly.

Professor Lockwood, of Chicago, addressed the meeting. He is a very forceful speaker and set up Spiritualism as the greatest belief in the world, saying that it would have carried the whole world had not it been opposed in the beginning by ministers who had to preach against it to earn their salaries. He showed that no religion had ever shown such a growth in forty-nine years as has Spiritualism, and carried the opinion that it would be the one belief in a century from now. Mrs. Kates concluded the program with a short address. On motion of Mrs. Armstrong a vote of thanks was extended to Mr. and Mrs. Hyde for their hospitality.

Dr. Kates tried to get Mr. Hyde to say something definite as to what disposition he would make of the property of spiritualistic fame. The Spiritualists want to buy the house and two acres of land, but it is understood that Mr. Hyde will do nothing more than lease it. It is desired to have summer meetings in Hydesville, erect a large building with platform for speaking and have a sort of camp-meeting by the Spiritualists every summer. But no bargain for the property was made and it is very uncertain as to what will be done in the premises.

Newark, N. J.

A GREAT OCCASION.

CELEBRATION OF THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY, AT ROCHESTER, N. Y.—FIRST DAY'S MEETINGS—ABLE DISCOURSES—SPIRIT COMMUNICATIONS—MRS. S. A. ARMSTRONG, LYMAN C. HOWE AND Z. B. KATES THE PRINCIPAL SPEAKERS OF THE OPENING MEETINGS—REVISED REPORT FOR THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

The opening sessions of the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism were held yesterday at Fitzhugh hall under the auspices of the First Spiritualist Church of this city. Three meetings were held during the day and some of the most noted advocates of their faith were present to set forth the doctrines which may be said to have had their birth in this vicinity nearly a half century ago. The conferences will continue for three days, with three sessions each day. These meetings are held largely for the purpose of promoting the Semi-Centennial Jubilee, which is to be held in Rochester in 1898.

More than the usual interest was manifested in yesterday's proceedings and large audiences, made up of a strong intermixture of the devout and the curious, assembled at each one of the sessions. As the visitor entered the he was confronted with the comforting assurance, printed in large letters over the door, "There is No Death." Behind the speakers' platform was another announcement to the effect that immortality is proven. Palms and potted plants are arranged in profusion on each side of the rostrum, and in the center there is a table upon which is a picture of the famous Fox Sisters, founders of Modern Spiritualism, surrounded with bouquets of fleur-de-lis and poppies. In front of the table there is a pillow with the figures "1848" in red flowers on a background of green. Flags and bunting also added to the attractiveness of the room.

The meeting yesterday morning was opened by G. W. Kates, who pronounced the invocation to the spirits. He then invited all visiting mediums and local officers to take seats on the platform and about twenty responded to the request. Among these were Mrs. Atchinson, medium of the Buffalo temple; Rev. Samuel Weil, a former rabbi of the Jewish church; Lyman C. Howe, R. D. Jones, Mr. Rice, of Greigsville; Mrs. Burtiss and Mrs. Joslin, of this city.

"THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH."

The speaker of the morning was Mrs. Dr. S. Augusta Armstrong, who besides being a Spiritualist, has a broad interest in the enfranchisement of women, being the president of the Buffalo Woman's Equality Club. Mrs. Armstrong's theme was "Spirit of Truth." She said among other things:

"Prayers innumerable are ascending to the throne of the Divine Essence of our being that God's will may be done on earth as it is in heaven, but all such supplications can never bring the kingdom of heaven on earth. Frederick Douglas once said that he prayed long and earnestly for freedom but it came not until he began to pray with his legs and ran away from slavery. Just so it is with many Spiritualists and other Christians; that good time they hope and pray for can never come to them until they run away from the bondage to self and make sacrifices of all earthly idols and self-righteous opinions. 'Except ye forsake all for my sake (Spiritualism), ye are not worthy to become my disciples.'

"Let us have here at these meetings such complete and entire spiritual freedom, such perfect equality that the lowliest soul of earth may come and be uplifted into the light of perfect day. Where all are made welcome, there the good we so much desire will be accomplished. Let us look to the uplifting of earth-bound spirits as well as the blinded and prejudiced souls of the world, for I believe that the work of spiritualizing disembodied minds must precede the same work on earth. At our meetings may the spirits feel a prayer ascending at each breath for universal redemption.

"This is an age of progress, but few stop to think that the road of progress leads past many stations. Most people tire on the way and stop at the first station. If induced to journey on, few will consent to go further than the second. So it has ever been with all religions. When a Baptist became a Universalist, he insisted that he had found the last and only station and that there were no more. Afterwards he was induced to move on, when lo, he found Spiritualism and then he cried, 'Eureka, now I am at the end.' So you will find thousands of Modern Spiritualists clinging to their last station, while the train of progress goes plunging ever onward. They say, 'I began with the raps and I have witnessed every phase of spiritual phenomena, and so I am a confirmed Spiritualists.' But if you saw a physician amputate an arm, would that make you a surgeon?

"I believe that it is a grander thing to spiritualize one man or woman than to materialize a hundred spirits. Do not think that I deprecate the phenomena, far from it, for are we not celebrating the anniversary of those tiny raps? Our star of the East led us to a manger in Bethlehem where was born to us many a savior and through all these years they have suffered many a crucifixion while the Savior of the Bible was obliged, according to their tell, to receive but one. Our mediums are being crucified and persecuted every day for their faith.

"There is a glory and beauty in every tiny rap that tells us that the heavens are watching over us, but phenomena are not all, they lead to something. They are the pathway but not the end of the journey. But to grow better spiritually and morally as we advance in our investigations is the glory of Spiritualism. The strongest word of our vocabulary aside from the word 'love' is the word 'do.' It is not what you do. Such a religion is not hard to understand, it is simply the salvation of love—a little more of the 'do' spirit in our lives. It is not begging you to come to it, but only asks you to help yourselves become spiritual and lead a life of blamelessness.

"Do not stop short of this point, for a little learning is a dangerous thing. Therefore, you should search to the height and depth of its philosophy. Man's true redemption opens when the soul, captive to visible, tangible and material things, resumes its sovereignty and ascends to liberty with the departed. Truth does not impress itself upon reason by a formal creed, it speaks from the universe and to comprehend it is to understand the universe. When we live naturally and in the true order of our evolution we are emphatically in the atmosphere of truth.

"Truth affirms that the babe of Bethlehem became a savior by living the life of a great emancipator. 'Hold fast to that which is good' constitutes the eternal precept of his religion. When all Christianity embraces the intellectual liberty which the Christ came to bestow, the dungeon walls of theology will be transformed and truth will shine forth with noonday splendor. Truth not only inspired Christ to emancipate the intellectual and moral power of man but to set at liberty the imprisoned love. This enlargement of personal being was the grand essential aim of Christ's ministrations on earth.

"Truth never changes. Men change their conceptions of truth. All changes and evolutions are in and belong to matter. Our ancient Spiritualism so far as truth is concerned is identical with Modern Spiritualism. Truth is entirely independent of all sects, or creeds, or isms, and cannot be superseded by any form of man's philosophy. Man must look for truth within himself. Every one must interpret these things for himself and his interpretation will be a true reflex of himself, for man is as he thinks, and, therefore, the idea of truth governs all his actions; hence, I would name our belief the 'Spirit of Truth.'

"Truth is absolute for all eternity. Our spiritual faith is in its entirety a far greater truth than many of its advocates have any conception of, nor can until they cease to make an idol of their ism. So, friends, let us be born again into the light of the simple truth in God's sunshine. To have a correct faith is one thing, but to have a correct life is better. A higher life and a purer spirit are imperiously demanded in our age, and if we are truly spiritual we will go hand in hand with all forms of truth. We have not found the last station in the road of progress. We must grow and and growth is invariably gradual.

"Spiritual beauty must be cultivated. It shines forth in the countenance. The cherishing of evil passions disfigure the face, but a lovely character has a transforming power. Love is the best sculptor, and no face can fail to be attractive that is animated by truth and love. Let us all hasten to attune our hearts so that we may catch the first harmonizing sound wave as it passes and with the wave comes also the wave of thought and who knows but what the processes of the mind leave a lasting trace on an environment as real and visible as the tangible thing we call matter, and some day when the spiritual eye looks upon a new-found universe it will see in a changeless form the real and substantial results of these mind and thought waves."

After the address several "tests" were made by Mrs. Zaida Brown Kates, of this city. Mrs. Kates said that she was in the power of the higher spirits and while under the influence would call forth the spirits of relatives and friends of persons in the audience. In most cases the persons recognized the descriptions of the departed. Mrs. Kates has a very impressive way of relating what she believes she sees in the spirit world, and it makes a decidedly shivery feeling creep up the backs of her auditors. The performance is interesting to say the least, and leaves a lasting impression upon those who witness it.

THE AFTERNOON MEETING.

At the mid-day meeting held at 2:30 o'clock, the attendance was larger than that of the morning, and the interest was proportionately great. People are attracted to the meetings, some by their devotion to the doctrines taught there, others by idle curiosity only, and still others by a desire to know more of this strange sect of believers in spirit communication. Whatever the motive, however, that impels the visitor to become a participant in these meetings, he is soon lost in his ever increasing interest in all that takes place.

Instead of having an invocation at the opening of the session yesterday afternoon, G. W. Kates recited a poem. "Will it Pay?" which contained a whole prayer and sermon in itself. After the choir had sung an anthem, Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, was introduced, who was to give an address under the control of the spirits, if, as he said, the spirits so willed. The subject chosen was "Where Are We At?" Mr. Howe said in the absence of the controlling spirits, he would read an article prepared by a fellow townsman, "who had the misfortune to be a Spiritualist." He had not fairly started his reading, however, when he suddenly clapped his hands, wiped the perspiration from his brow, closed his eyes and launched into his subject "under control." He kept his eyes closed during the whole discourse, and when he had finished, he acted as if coming out of a trance.

The address was clothed in the richest rhetoric, abounding in Choate-like sentences, and containing many extracts of poems composed improvisedly, as it were, by the controlling spirits. He traced the history of Spiritualism from its inception, forty-nine years ago in the cottage of the Fox sisters, Hydesville, and said that that event was the awakening of human attention to a truth as old as God himself, that truth which has woven the texture and fabric that has ultimated in man. He spoke of the motto that was hung over the door to the effect that there is no death, and said that was not true in the sense that the body ceases to manifest the functions of life, but that it was true in that there is no loss of the individual consciousness of the mind. Immortality, continued the speaker, cannot be proven, even though the continuity of life can be demonstrated. Immortality is a condition that cannot die, and how can that be proven?

Mr. Howe said that among the earliest devotees of Spiritualism were some of the brightest minds of the century, who caught the fire from heaven as the raps echoed from their consciousness. He told of the number of men who flocked to the house of the Fox family to get their creeds confirmed, and who found that their beliefs were partly right, but mostly wrong. He said that they found also that the Bible was not wholly right, even though its pages contained much divine inspiration. After twenty years the sect began to grow in favor until there were over ten million Spiritualists in the United States, and in 1862 Judge Edmonds was led to declare that it was not the purpose of Spiritualism to bring up a new sect, but to leaven the whole lump, and bring salvation to the heathen in the churches.

The speaker claimed that the woman's equality movement owes its origin, its perseverence and its success to Modern Spiritualism, and that it was begun at the time when "the rappings of Hydesville echoed around the world." He said that while people accept the doctrines of Christianity through faith, they come to believe in Spiritualism through actual demonstrations.

He further affirmed that Spiritualism is to each one just what he makes it and that the fact of spiritual communications cannot be gainsaid, but the use that is made of it depends upon the person himself. Whatever there is of fact in any religion is a factor of Spiritualism. The speaker concluded his address by saying that now at the close of the nineteeth century scientists, clergymen, Jews and Gentiles are giving to Modern Spiritualism their most serious consideration. This said he, is where we are at as regards the present phase of the sect.

After the lecture, the choir rendered a selection, and then Mr. Kates introduced Mrs. A. Atcheson, a medium of Buffalo, who gave an exhibition of her power to call forth beings from the spirit world and have them communicate, through her, with persons in the audience. Her tests were satisfactory to all who were directly interested in them.

"THE BEAUTIES OF DEATH."

At the evening's service the hall was comfortably filled with an audience that expressed its interest in the address and tests by frequent outbursts of applause. The invocation was pronounced by Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, after which Professor Oliver pleased his hearers with a cornet solo.

The address of the evening was delivered by Mrs. Zaida Brown Kates, a local medium. She was supposed to be speaking "under spirit control," having provided the subject, "The Beauty of Death." She said that men from all ages have been afraid of death more than anything else, that they are like children who have a morbid fear of darkness; that the physical mind and body stand before the evidence of death and seem to be devoid of all joy.

"This," she continued, "is strange, for we die daily. But I say to you to-night that you have before you not the richness of material things, but the growing worth of immortality; something that touches us as nothing else can do. We have been taught that death is the acme of terror; a grim monster that awaits at every door and that king and peasant alike must bow to its indomitable power. We were taught that death awaited us with a terror that could speak only to the souls of the damned, and no matter how you believed, unless you swallowed every creed, your soul should be immortally damned.

"Some in the very flush of beauty, when every bell tolled this terrible sorrow, 'Thou art dying, art doomed, eternal pain and anguish awaits you, and thy life is but a span to be merged in the outer darkness of want.' These bells have been ringing the sound of perdition, 'No hope, no ray of light to pierce the shades of darkness,' when in 1848, there was heard a bell of sweetest music, 'There is life beyond the grave,' and the angel choristers took up the glad cry, 'There are no dead,' and every soul stopped and listened and drew back with terror and amazement.

"But out of the gloom of ages, we know that truth is infallible and that it stands triumphant on the principles of right. From Spiritualism the world got a beautiful philosophy, one that is greater than that of Demosthenes or of Socrates, because the Nazarene taught it on the plains of Galilee. It tells us of the beauty of death that will forever dispel the chill that terrifies us and tells us that beyond the exchange of life there is work and progress. Science has proven that matter can never be destroyed. It has proven that through all the ages and to-day we stand in an age of vibratory action."

The speaker then spoke very feelingly of the parting of loved ones on earth and of the attempt of the burdened soul to find out where the departed one dwells. She said that men accept such things as the will of God or as a punishment for some sin. "But," said she, "I say, do you imagine that God, a just and wise mediator, if you please, a tender and loving father, would punish his children by taking away the loved and the best? Will He condemn one soul to pitiless torment through no fault of its own? When you came upon earth you certainly did not come except to fulfill the God-given plan that belongs to the beautiful universe.

"The mind of man has tried to chain the invincible power of Niagara, but he has succeeded only in part. So truth is like the mighty Niagara; the more you stop it, but no more. So Spiritualism is like the mighy Niagara; the more you try to oppose it, the stronger will grow its power. Spiritualism is the vibration of God's law in the universe, and oppose and stop it if you can. Investigate it and you will learn that death is the sweetest thing that ever blessed a child of earth, and you will have the power within you to prove the immortality of the soul.

"All through Biblical times men were entertaining angels unawares, and you know that God's laws are unchangeable, and so angels tread among us today. We know that our friends come out of the miasma and horrors of the grave and speak to us in every breath. Their voices proclaim the goodness of God and the immortality of the soul. This faith proves the beauty of dying, namely, to know that we go on and on through all eternity and that we are liberated from the environments of the body and come out into a realization of true immortality. You say that Spiritualists are frauds, but there could not be a fraud unless there had been a truth in the first place.

"Remember that the beauty of dying is that it brings us to a realization of what we need and what we are likely to expect. Spiritualism is the only religion that is not stained by the crimson tide of massacre and the waste of human life. It came through the lips of little children. We believe that death is life's fullest fruition and that by its means we recognize the corridors of the living, and stand at the footstone of heaven to drink of immortal life."

At the close of the address G. W. Kates was on the program for a few remarks but instead of making an address, he preferred to recite the poem entitled, "Peter McGuire." It was rendered in an effective manner and the audience showed its approval by hearty applause. The evening's meeting was closed with a few "tests" by Mrs. Atcheson and Mrs. Kates. These were similar to the ones given at the previous meetings, and elicited great amazement and interest from those who witnessed the performance.

THE SECOND DAY'S MEETINGS of the Forty-ninth Annual Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism were as full of interest as those of the preceding day. There were several more visiting mediums present, and the tests that were made by those who claimed to be under control of the spirits baffled the minds of three large audiences. In the morning a conference was held at Fitzhugh hall, and at the afternoon and evening meetings several good addresses were

A Thrilling, Psychological Story of Evangelization and Free Thought. It is to Protestantism what the "Secrets of the Convent" is to Catholicism.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

The distinguished author, Hudson Tuttle, requires no introduction to the readers of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, but the following headings of chapters will show them what they may expect from the book:

CONTENTS:—An Idyl—Fordham—Building the Church—The Evangelist—Blood—The Saloon—The Lost Daughter—Law—The Harvest of Souls—Jane Grey—The Mother of Cain—Evolution—Stella—The Cell—Death—A Step Forward—The Home Circle—The Double Role—Heresy—Annette—The Bank Robbery—Liberty—All is Well That Ends Well—The New Church—The New Way; Led to the Light.

Every chapter is devoted to one idea, and the whole presents so many tableaux moving onward to the climax. The fiendish career of the revivalist is contrasted with the character of the honest minister and the thinking agnostic. The steps by which a preacher emerges from the church, and the difficulties he meets are graphically presented. The new church and progressive lyceum evolved out of the old, form an interesting study to those seeking new methods.

A CONCORDANCE

To the principal passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism;

Together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible.

BY MOSES HULL.

Much that is in this book appeared in an abridged form in a series of nine full pages of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. These articles were prepared at the call of hundreds of Spiritualists who felt the need of some kind of document for ready reference. They only seemed to whet the appetite for more; hence the publication of this work.

The author, Moses Hull, has written many volumes on Spiritualistic and other themes and each one is full of careful study on the subject chosen. Mr. Hull, in his introduction of this work says:

"Hoping that this book will serve to lead the people out of the wilderness of doubt and despair; and that when Spiritualism shall have wrested the Bible from its 'sanctified' enemies, it will not 'spike' it, but will use it to batter down the walls of Christian superstition and ignorance, I send it out on its errand of enlightenment with the humble prayer that it will prove a divine benediction to every reader."

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM contains 385 pages, beautifully printed on good paper, contains a full-page portrait of the author and is handsomely bound in cloth. Every Spiritualist should have this work.

THE COMING

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR.

BY BURTON AMES HUNTINGTON.

This excellent book is written in the interest of humanity, of liberty, and of patriotism—a book written for the purpose of calling attention to the deadly dangers that beset us on every side, and more especially to the hostile attitude and the insidious wiles of an ever-present, though secret, unscrupulous foe—the Catholics. Washington's words of warning, Lincoln's apprehension and the prophecy of General Grant are all included in the volume. Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, in a recent sermon said: "The church tolerates heretics where she is obliged to do so, but she hates them with a deadly hatred, and uses all her power to annihilate them. Our enemies know how she treated heretics in the Middle Ages, and how she treats them today where she has the power. We no more think of denying these historic facts than we do of blaming the Holy Ghost and the princes of the church for what they have thought fit to do." Every one should read this work. Paper, 300 pages. It will be sent, postpaid, for fifty cents. For sale at this office.

A GRAND AND GLORIOUS FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION AT ROCHESTER, N. Y.

A GREAT OCCASION.

delivered, and tests made by the mediums.

Chairman G. W. Kates, in opening the morning's conference, referred to the convention that is being held in Syracuse, and then in part:

"We believe the great necessity in the State of New York is that we should see that this State does not fall behind others in matters pertaining to spiritualism. For in the vicinity of Rochester the first rap was heard. We have been too long slumbering. Why no longer ago than yesterday I heard here in Rochester that men did not know who the Spiritualists are. Just think of it, here in Rochester, where the first public investigation of the rappings was made in the old Corinthian Academy.

"We must take a deep interest in the development of the principles of Spiritualism. We have no cause to grumble when we do not take an active part here in our local work. It is not our province perhaps to do anything at this meeting in a business way. But we have come from various parts of the State and if we desire certain things, we may discuss them, meditate upon them and prepare for them.

"I do not believe in hasty action. We have had too much of that. Two or three persons have organized a movement which succeeds but for a time. We do not find the proper spirit of co-operative work. There is too much desire on the part of individuals to be at the top. There is some excuse for the mediums in this respect, for it is a great work with them. They must sacrifice their time and labor to the cause they have been called upon to espouse. Each medium is working largely for personal results. This is caused by lack of co-operative work. I am in hopes that there will be those here who will give accentuation to the effort we have espoused.

"There will be no objection to a resolution looking to the advisement of the Spiritualists of New York State. Let us as citizens of New York endeavor to develop some movement that will conduce to better organization in this State. The subject of organization of our forces has always been a nightmare with us. While we have feared it, we have desired it.

"We cannot develop Spiritualism into a church. The name of an institution under which wrongs may have been committed does not preclude the fact that good may be done by it. We understand that underlying Spiritualism is a religious sentiment. Spiritualism has a duty to perform. The development of our ideas of life continuous, our spiritual life, our moral forces, society and a church representative of all people, free and untrammeled is before us. We are yet after forty-nine years still in the midst of a discussion as to our duty; as to our position in society. It behooves us therefore to give this subject our earnest thought.

"This great question necessitates that we shall confer together and if deemed advisable to send our opinions to the State convention. Our test mediums invite the skeptic to receive. The result is that our public labor is for those who are merely looking on in curiosity. So after all we are working for proselytes rather than for the advancement and development of our own sympathizers. Therefore, our members say: 'Your associated work does us no good,' and they draw from us. I go from city to city, continually and I find new faces and miss those whom I have known as connected with the work. They say 'We have no Devil, we no longer fear God.' We have nothing to cement us together. The trouble is that we do not not feed our members. Now I want the public propaganda, but I want the interior organization that will be of utility to our members, mentally, morally and spiritually.

"While I am not as a rule in favor of secret society work I discover, nevertheless, that in churches the members come together by themselves. There are organizations having a distinct secret membership. It is the cementing property by and for which they develop. These are to some extent secret societies, but no more so than the G.A.R., which has a password or something of that kind.

"Our mediums are dragged down by people asking at seances regarding divorces, love affairs and property matters, which should not be considered. We should gather more by our ourselves and avoid such interruptions."

At the afternoon meeting the invocation was pronounced by Rev. Samuel Weil, who was once a Jewish rabbi. The principal address was delivered by Mrs. S. Augusta Armstrong, of Buffalo. She said that as this was the celebration of the coming of such wonderful things through children, she would take as a text to her remarks the well-known poem entitled "The Light on Dead Man's Bar." The poem is a story of a little girl who, in the absence of her father, stood during the whole night turning the wheels of the beacon light at sea, thus saving the life of her sailor brother, with two-score of his companions. She said partly:

"There is surely a lesson in this story. I think it teaches us to think of the good that each of earth's creatures can do. There are many tending a dead man's light with no thought of hardships to themselves, with no thought of themselves, if they can but save a fellow creature from the storms that come on the sea of life. Let us, like the child, when we see our duty before us, go bravely to work, and we shall some day hear the welcome words, 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joys of the home you have builded while in the land of shadows.' God governs in the life of man by trusting in each one some gift. One single soul, true unto its ideal, sweet in charity, brings the kingdom of nature very near to the earthly life.

"The true ideal, man or woman, is the athletic body in whom all faculties are equally developed. Not outward weakness but inward strength must be the test of morality in life. To-day the riches and pleasures clamor for our attention. We are becoming so absorbed in the pursuit of material prosperity that we are neglecting our spiritual inheritance. The riches we all can command are spiritual riches. They await us all, and they will be given to those who seek them in the proper spirit. If we cannot have both, then there should be but one choice. In my hours of dreams the different religions come up before me, and I believe it would do us all good could we but put all denominations together and ask them to find what is common to them all, and thus living out what is both common and best to all, we would find a pure Christianity in doctrine and action."

The speaker then dwelt upon the pessimistic belief that the world is getting worse and worse all the time, and said that they were wrong because truth was prevailing, and truth is ever in the direction of prosperity. Continuing:

"Spiritualism is the nurse of economy, the patron of industry, the guardian of integrity and the guide to success. Religious liberty is the most resplendent gem in Columbia's diadem. Our defense as a nation should be spiritual righteousness. We must let the nations see that the true spirit of heaven and earth is not the god of war, but peace, sweet peace. This is a free religious country, and the church, the synagogue and our pure spiritual teachings, with the aid of a free and liberal press, which you have every reason to be thankful for in this beautiful city of Rochester, are the powers of the throne. And let me say right here that I thank the press of this city for the kind attention given to our convention.

"Faith and liberty are the two treasures of the soul. Forms and rituals are traditional dogmas of good, but they do not illuminate the soul as one such act as that of the dear child tending the beacon light at Dead Man's bar. The world needs such persons to lead men into the dawn of safety and of an awakened day."

Mr. Lyman C. Howe said that he wished to second the thanks extended to the press and urged the people to use their influence in favor of papers that are fair in their treatment of all questions and themes that present themselves for solution at the present time. He favored especially the Rochester papers, because, said he, they are more just and generous than those in any neighboring cities. Mrs. Armstrong recited a poem in the interests of woman suffrage, in whose cause she is an earnest worker. She was followed by G. W. Kates, who rendered a poem descriptive of Western life.

The afternoon meeting was closed with the usual tests given by Mrs. Atcheson, of Buffalo, and Mrs. Z. B. Kates, of this city. Mrs. Atcheson took the floor first and called forth several spirits of departed friends and relatives of persons in the audience. She stood in front of the platform, closed her eyes, and then walked down the aisle to an aged man, and gave a satisfactory description of an aunt long since deceased.

Mrs. Kates then gave some exhibitions of her wonderful power as a medium. She called forth first a husband who warned the wife "not to sign the deed." The lady recognized the description of her deceased husband, and said that she had been contemplating the action against which she was warned. She added also that she had never seen the medium before and that Mrs. Kates had no means of knowing her family relations. Other spirits were described and the most prejudiced of her hearers were led to shake their heads in wonder and amazement at what was being revealed to them. The last test performed was that of allowing a person in the audience to call out the name of a spirit. The name of "Arthur Waterbury" was given, whereupon Mrs. Kates gave a minute description of the person, which tallied with the facts, so far as was known by the man who gave the name. The medium was greeted with prolonged applause as she took her seat after her successful performance.

THE EVENING SESSION.

It seemed as if interest and enthusiasm were at their highest pitch last evening. The hall was well filled and all was expectancy as the twenty or thirty mediums took their seats upon the platform. The invocation was pronounced by Mrs. S. Augusta Armstrong, after which a vocal duet was very well rendered by Miss Carrie Cowert and G. E. Jones.

In introducing the first speaker of the evening, Chairman G. W. Kates said: "People have been honored for what they have been but not for what they have achieved. In Spiritualism you will find persons from all ranks of life. From all sects and classes we have drawn our adherents. It is said that the Hebrews and Catholics never change their religion, but from these two sects we have drawn a great number by the positive truth of the continuity of life. We have with us to-night one who has been a rabbi in several of the Jewish synogogues of this State, but who is now the pastor of the First Spiritualist Church at Bradford. I have great pleasure in introducing Rev. Samuel Weil."

Mr. Weil, who is a tall man, with a long flowing gray beard, spoke with voice and gestures peculiar to his race, and held the interest of his hearers for over an hour. The subject of the address was "Spiritualism, the Religion of the Future." He said, in part:

"The universe is made up of a plan, which we call the laws of nature, and the knowledge and observation of these laws are the source of all power that man has. A portion of this plan has been disclosed, the physical portion, by which man becomes a creator, using one law to counteract the other, and so achieve his purpose. Man's welfare consists in his obedience to these laws, physical, mental and moral. Science is the conception of this plan of the universe.

"'Man thinks over again the thoughts of the Almighty.' If these laws were arbitrary, there would be no science. We all admit that nature is according to a preconceived plan, and therefore that the universe was made for a purpose and man is compelled to study this plan whereby he may become a creator in miniature. For every organ in the body man has a corresponding invention, for he 'thinks over again the thoughts of the Almighty.' We call this purpose of the universe, which is the object and end and aim of human life, a philosophy, a religious philosophy is the attempt to find out the purpose of existence, and the destiny of man by reason, while science contemplates the method. In the history of thought we have been more successful in finding out the why and the how, but since science was born every progress it has made has disturbed religious feelings.

"As science progresses, philosophy and religion seem to diminish. Men become agnostics and say that we cannot know anything for a certainty, but there are no absolute mysteries and man is destined to know all things and become master of the planet he lives on. Nothing is to be hidden from him. Ignorance is a necessity that may become wise and man must meet temptation in order that he may learn its power and conquer it. Therefore, man must also eat from the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

"The purpose of morality implies ethics, morality, and in this there is chaos because there is no basis for a science of morals outside of the church. Consider that the children are not taught morals in the schools, but in the churches, and as the churches all disagree there can be no congruity, no unity. Absolute morals must have a foundation in natural law. What is the highest good? Why are we here? What is man's destiny? If you do not know these, you can have no basis for morality. There is cosmos in the physical world, but chaos in the spiritual world. When man becomes to know the moral laws there will be absolute unity. All law is divine, there is no such thing as sacred or profane law, and if man transgress these, 'behold, your sins will find you out.'

"A little discovery was made in 1848, not by scientific nor philosophic geniuses, in fact it was not a discovery at all, but it came as a revelation. People who were underground have been knocking at our doors and saying that the time has come for us to know that there is no death, no more acceptance by faith, no more supposition, but knowledge, and demonstration. It came as a thief in the night. Not indeed to the seats of the learned, but this greatest of all revelations came to the most lowly. But people did not accept the doctrines of Spiritualism because of their whining agnosticism. But we ask you to take from whatever direction. Can any good come out of Spiritualism? Come and see."

The speaker at this point dwelt at some length upon the experiences of his life; how he had inherited a religious feeling from his mother, but that he had early become a doubter, and wished to have some manifestation of God. And this, said he, came at last in the principles of Spiritualism. He then explained that all the controversies arising over man's misconception of moral laws will come to an end through modern Spiritualism. Continuing he said:

"Religion, philosophy and science are all revolutionized in Spiritualism. It will inaugurate the kingdom of God, because it reveals a moral law, and is therefore the great religion of the future. It gives a superstructure to Darwinism and unites all reforms. Spiritualism says that it must be so, for it is divine law. This is the great system, and there can be only one. There is no room for any more. I ask you not to go by what is fashionable or popular but if there is any originality in you, to believe a thing because of your conviction that it is right. In science and philosophy and religion it is always the minority that leads and I seem to hear the voice of the Great Spirit saying to the few, 'Go ye therefore unto all lands and preach the gospel unto every creaure, and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end.'"

After the address, "The First Settler's Story," a poem by Will Carleton, was rendered in a very effective manner by Mrs. H. F. Osburn, of this city. Lyman C. Howe was to have improvised a poem with the aid of the spirits, but he begged to be excused and said that he would thus favor the audience at the meeting this afternoon.

The exercises of the evening were concluded with several tests made by Mrs. Atcheson and Mrs. Kates. The conditions, however, did not seem to be favorable in most cases, for the persons addressed failed to recognize the spirits. In other instances, the attempts were successful, and the audience left the building pleased and mystified.

CLOSE OF THE ANNIVERSARY OF SPIRITUALISM AT ROCHESTER, N. Y.

The celebration of the Forty-ninth Anniversary of modern Spiritualism in this city came to a close last evening at Fitzhugh hall, and this morning the mediums and friends will go on an excursion to the Fox cottage at Hydesville, where the rappings were first heard. Three sessions were held yesterday and each was full of interest for every one who attended them. The first session, held—at 10:30 a. m., was in the nature of a conference, at which many brief addresses were delivered by local and visiting Spiritualists.

Chairman Kates in his opening remarks said that he was firmly convinced that there is a material science in connection with Spiritualism and that if there is anything true in the belief it is that there is a natural world. "I believe," said he, "in the practical side of Spiritualism. For twenty-five years I have worked on that theory. We should become thoroughly prepared to develop the work to which we have devoted our lives. To-day we can claim that the occult forces know no boundaries.

"The practical thing I wish to suggest is that we should have here in Rochester a Fox memorial. We should own the Fox cottage. We hope to obtain possession of it, inclose it an establish there a spiritual museum where all the various manifest tokens received from the spirit world, the historical things indicating the growth of the movement, could be collected. We could have there in time a college. And we could have almost at once an annual meeting place.

"I believe that as a beginning we should erect here in Rochester a Fox memorial. We have one year to work on that idea before the celebration of the Semi-Centennial of the discovery of the rappings. This Fox memorial in Rochester we should have said more about. I desire to say we are not going to beg. We are going to ask each one of you to do something. If you desire to do something for the cause don't wait until you have passed beyond. There is already a will made in this city giving $600 and perhaps $1,500 for this very purpose. A good sister in Nebraska sent me recently $1 for this purpose. If all would do this the amount would be enough. Rochester is so near to Hydesville as to be the same as that in location when a memorial is to be considered. I hope meetings will be held monthly or oftener to raise funds. We must have an edifice everywhere. I am well aware of that.

"Someone has said that Ferdinand, son of Katie Fox is in want. Some funds have been raised for him. Having neglected Katie and Margaret, we should take care of the only son and heir, Ferdinand. The cottage is going to ruin and we must protect it. On our excursion to-morrow we may make plans to protect it. I recognize now New York as my home field. Here I shall work more or less during the coming year to perfect these plans and for the good of Spiritualism generally. Let us all take an interest in this work.

"Whether or not the National Association holds the great jubilee here, as has been proposed, we shall be interested in it. But I believe the big jubilee will be held here. We will have all the theaters and perhaps a big temporary building filled with an enthusiastic army from all over the nation. It will be second to nothing of the kind, and it will be to the honor of Rochester Spiritualists to make this grand result depend upon their efforts. Contributions may be made for the Fox memorial or for the big jubilee.

"We have temples in various cities—one costing $250,000 in Boston. We have mediums' homes in Massachusetts and eight other States. We have plans for colleges for the teaching of psychic science and summer schools for the same purpose, and we have schools for a concise and thorough study of the Bible. What do you think of that? Many people think the Spiritualists do not study the Bible. It is a marvel how we have progressed in forty-nine years. And by faith we shall do greater works. This modern dispensation is for the development of work not yet done. Give us 100 years or even fifty years more and we shall develop as has no other sect. We are becoming very active. Now, these are very practical things and we should think upon them."

James T. Morrison, of Ithaca, was the next speaker, whose subject was "Spiritualism, the Religion of Reason." For the last eighteen years Mr. Morrison has been interested in the temperance cause and in his address he gave that subject more or less prominence. He recited several poems whose authorship he ascribed to his daughter who had died at three months of age and who was now twenty-five years old in the spirit world.

The last speaker of the morning was W. M. Lockwood, of Chicago, who has been called the "spiritual scientist." His remarks proved very interesting to his hearers.

PLATFORM MEETING AND TESTS.

The session of the afternoon partook somewhat of the nature of a platform meeting, with brief addresses interspersed with songs and tests by Mrs. Kates of this city. The attendance at the meeting showed the ever-increasing interest that is being manifested by Spiritualists and the public at large. Several new speakers were present, including Professor Lockwood, of Chicago, and Frank Walker, of the State Association.

The invocation was pronounced by Mrs. A. Atcheson, of Buffalo, after which the chairman introduced R. D. Jones, of this city, who spoke in a very interesting manner of "The History of the Raps." He began with an account of the hearing of the tiny raps in the house of the Fox family at Hydesville, and afterwards in this city. He dwelt very graphically upon the meetings that were held in the old Corinthian hall, when the mediums had to call upon Judge Moore for police protection from the mobs.

Mr. Jones paid a tribute to the Rochester press and said that the papers were ever willing to give a fair and honest report of religious or sectarian meetings. In referring to the early mediums he said: "Those friends I firmly believe, who bore the brunt of the battle and took the odium of ignorance and superstition, are here to-day. I cannot see them as some of the mediums here can, but I am sure that they are here. Veterans, you have done well at this anniversary, and you have been permitted to hear the angels' voices. Let us rejoice therein. There are battles yet to be fought. There are those who are ignorant of these great truths. There is a work to do and let us do it calmly, firmly and kindly. I tell you that the world is opening its eyes, and though there are disbelievers, the work still goes on. I know many noble-hearted men who believe the veritable fact of spirit communication as well as I do. Ere long they will open their eyes to the whole truth and acknowledge it to the world."

Mrs. Mary Parkhurst, a local medium, then arose and said that during the meetings she has seen the spirits of Isaac and Amy Post and others, and that every day she had observed a great scroll that was being let down from the ceiling. This scroll, she added, was one-sided and perfectly white, but she was sure that it would not always be so, for the names that would be written there would be legion. She was followed by Mrs. S. A. Burtis, another "mother in Israel," as she was called. She was one of the oldest of the local workers and her remarks elicited prolonged applause from here auditors.

G. W. Kates then gave his address on the "Future of Spiritualism." Among other things he said: "Who can marshall with the mighty hosts of the future that shall gather at the shrine of the spirit? Who can tell of the comforter that shall enter into the homes and soothe the tortured brow; who can tell of its peacefulness as it gives joy and harmony to the world; of the arts and sciences that Spiritualism shall develop? What will be your mission in the spirit world and what will be your ministry to those who are left behind? The future of Spiritualism will be everything that we can outline or idealize for it, yea, even more than this.

"But I look with prophetic eye to the future and I see men and women carrying a school-boy's slate under the arm. Up and down the busy marts of life they go, opening and reading something thereon. They are scholars once again. But I draw nearer and read a tender message from some loved one and I say is that all that these slates mean, that they are obtaining messages from the spirit life, 'and the spirit answers 'Yes.' As people carry Bibles from which to obtain a comforting word, so in the future I see people read from the slates the independent writings of the spirit that brings them true comfort.

"I see persons gathering at the fireside with all joyousness and prayerfulness, invoking the presence of the spirit, and over the land I see the rejoicing in the fact that men and women are redeemed from superstition, bigotry, intolerance and ignorance; the ushering in of institutions that shall not teach doctrines of the past but shall be under the divine influence of the present-day revelation, rejoicing in wisdom, not in superstition; the erection of a church of reason, revealing all that is possible for the utility of the human race. I see a time when wars will be banished, when the rearing of children from the glory and beauty of innocent life into the full expansion of the adult powers will be realized, and back of it all I see the power of the spirit.

"The future then says that Spiritualism gives promise for a glorious church of reason, a demonstration of fact. It says that in the redemption of the human race the hope of the world is in spiritual revelation and guidance."

Professor Lockwood, of Chicago, was next introduced. He is one of the foremost thinkers in spiritual philosophy and his remarks were listened to with the closest attention. He said that he always liked to stand before an audience of Spiritualists because they are people who dare to think. Continuing:

"Out of the invisible forces of nature we have the phenomena. Expressions of spiritual force are everywhere. The rappings heard at Hydesville were the result of an eternal principle of nature, the result of actions of consciousness through material productions. We don't believe in religion that is at a standstill. We like progressive mentality. To be a Spiritualist is to be a progressive thinker and what we need is to be able to understand the formulae of co-relations. The Rochester rappings were the first intelligent expression of this kind, of which we have historical record. It commenced an era of unfoldment."

At this point the speaker launched into a tirade against the Bible and Christianity in general, pronouncing its teachings as "trash," and its fruits as the "husks of a primitive theology." The atonement of Jesus Christ he termed a "fantasie" and the Jewish conception of heaven, "transcendental stuff." After relieving his mind in this manner at some length, he closed his remarks by giving the convention the congratulations of the Norwich Spiritual Association.

The last speaker of the afternoon was Frank Walker, who represented the State Association, whose organization will be perfected at a convention to be held in Syracuse, April 13th, 14th, and 15th. He said that plans were being made whereby a ten days' jubilee of Spiritualism will be held in Rochester at this time next year. He said that they would then show what Spiritualism has done and what it was capable of doing. This jubilee, he concluded, will be one of the grandest demonstrations of the cause. Mr. Walker is one of the youngest adherents to the faith and is looked to as a prominent exponent of the cause.

After a solo by G. E. Jones, Mrs. Kates said that she had been asked to give some tests under the manifest influence of her controlling spirit "Fritz." She complied with the request and then in a broken German-English accent carried out her tests, which were similar to those given at previous meetings. She bore messages from mothers to children, and from husbands to wives, and the persons who were directly interested wept tears of sorrow and of joy.

THE FINAL MEETING.

Interest reached a climax at the final meeting of the anniversary exercises last evening, when a large and enthusiastic audience gathered to hear the words and witness the wonders and mysticisms that the mediums had to offer. And no one was disappointed for "ghosts walked the earth" to the satisfaction of all who were present.

The program was opened with the invocation by Rev. Samuel Weil, of Bradford, after which Mrs. Kates sang a solo with charming effect. The principal address of the evening was delivered by Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia. Mr. Howe had been heard several times before during the convention and had established a reputation as a deep thinker and an interesting speaker, so that when he was introduced, last night, he was greeted with hearty applause. His theme was "One World at a Time."

The speaker said that there are millions of worlds floating in our nerves and blood and brain and that every atom, every thought, and every drop of water is a world; that the subdivisions of nature are infinite and every division is a world by itself. "One world at a time," said he, "is the motto of a people who ignore all attempts to fathom the possibilities of another existence across the borderland. There is a co-relation between all worlds, and persons who wish to reach the fullest conception of life must comprehend all."

Mr. Howe then brought his subject to what he called the interchange or affinity between one's outer, physical world, the body, and the inner consciousness or spiritual world, the soul. In the human bodies are living souls. Spirit is the ultimate source of all manifestations. "Spiritualism," he continued, "gives an understanding to nature and robs mysticism of its power to alarm. It is the way by which we may, while in the body, telephone through the ethereal sympathies by that mental chemistry of interchangeable relations. Tell me that the study of this world is all that we need, and that a knowledge of a future is not of value and where would be your incentive for effort. The one-world-at-a-time theory is a soul impoverishing and intellectual paralysis."

At the beginning of his address Mr. Howe clapped his hands loudly, thus calling for influence of the spirits. He delivered the discourse with his eyes closed and "under control." The conclusion was an improvised poem, expressed in beautiful words, arranged according to the arbitrary rules of meter.

During the evening brief addresses were made by Mrs. S. Augusta Armstrong, of Buffalo, and Rev. Samuel Weil, of Bradford, and Professor W. M. Lockwood, of Chicago.

SPIRIT MANIFESTATIONS.

After a vocal solo, rendered in a pleasing manner by Professor Deal, of this city, Mrs. A. Atcheson, of Buffalo, exhibited her power as a medium. Conditions were all favorable for spirit walkings and all her tests were successful, from the standpoint of believers in Spiritualism. She descended from the platform and stood in front of the audience. After passing her hand over her eyes she walked down the aisle to an elderly lady and said that she saw the spirit of a little child who passed away in infancy across the ocean. "I feel that it is your daughter," said she, "and I see your thoughts going back to that old home, and I hear also a mother's voice comforting you. She tells you that you will soon cross the ocean again to your home. Do you recognize the spirits?"

The lady addressed answered that everything, so far as she knew was correct.

"Now," said the medium, "I see the spirit of a man who says 'I want my wife.'" She walked to a gray-haired woman and told her that it was her husband John, who died very suddenly. This spirit was recognized, and then Mrs. Atcheson went to a young lady in the front row and described the spirit of a beautiful woman, holding an anchor of flowers. She told the young lady that she was of very nervous temperament but, that the spirit is opening the door to a brighter path and that the thing she was anxious about will be settled very soon. "Do you understand? You do? I thank you."

To another woman who sat close by, she said: "I see the spirit of an elderly lady, over a medium in height, with white, waving hair. She shows me a road, and that means a change in your life. She says that she is your grandmother and that you will see her face to face before two weeks have passed." With this she concluded her tests and thanked the audience for its sympathy.

Last on the program was Mrs. Zaida Brown Kates, who arose to show her unfathomable power in summoning ghosts from that bourne from which, it seems, that travelers do return. She was greeted with a burst of applause, for she has come to be a favorite with Rochester audiences.

The first spirit that she sensed was that of a "boy in form, but a man in wisdom." The boy, through the medium, said, "The home has been desolate, and vacant and lonely, but I come this time to give my mother a message." Mrs. Kates said that she was attracted to a lady of about sixty years of age, seated in the front aisle. The lady indicated recognized the spirit of her boy and was visibly affected by the revelation.

The medium then sensed the spirit of a beautiful young girl, who passed away with a longing for life. The girl had pretty, blue eyes, soft brown hair, and she faded away like a lily. The speaker pointed to a white-haired woman and asked her if she recognized her daughter. The answer was in the affirmative. The next spirit that appeared was that of gentleman, described as five feet eight inches in height, a man of deep thought, sound reason and marvelous self-control. This man she said was the father of an elderly woman in the audience. Directions in regard to certain business transactions, and a graphic description of a fall that happened in the life of the person addressed were given and all details were pronounced correct.

This morning the mediums and friends will go to Hydesville and hold exercises in the cottage of the Fox family were Modern Spiritualism had its inception.—Rochester Democrat.

The Best. The Rest. The Test.

There are two kinds of sarsaparilla: The best—and the rest. The trouble is they look alike. And when the rest dress like the best who's to tell them apart? Well, "the tree is known by its fruit." That's an old test and a safe one. And the taller the tree the deeper the root. That's another test. What's the root,—the record of these sarsaparillas? The one with the deepest root is Ayer's. The one with the richest fruit: that, too, is Ayer's. Ayer's Sarsaparilla has a record of half a century of cures; a record of many medals and awards—culminating in the medal of the Chicago World's Fair, which, admitting Ayer's Sarsaparilla as the best—shut its doors against the rest. That was greater honor than the medal, to be the only Sarsaparilla admitted as an exhibit at the World's Fair. If you want to get the best sarsaparilla of your druggist, here's an infallible rule: Ask for the best and you'll get Ayer's. Ask for Ayer's and you'll get the best.

THE World's Sixteen Saviors,
—OR—
CHRISTIANITY BEFORE CHRIST.
BY KERSEY GRAVES.
New and startling revelations in religious history which disclose the Oriental origin of all the doctrines, principles precepts and miracles of the Christian New Testament, and furnishing a key for unlocking many of its sacred mysteries, besides comprising the History of Sixteen Oriental Crucified Gods. This wonderful and exhaustive volume will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which the author has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape, the student of free thought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows to the mark. Printed on fine white paper, 380 pages. New edition, revised and corrected, with portrait of author.

THE HOLY SPIRIT HAS FLED.

"I believe that God is actually withdrawing his Holy Spirit from his church as a body," said Rev. A. T. Pierson, D. D., in an address at a missionary rally, in Scranton, Pa., so cited in that great Presbyterian organ, the New York Observer.

Before The Progressive Thinker can indorse the statement of the Reverend Doctor, it will require proof that the Holy Spirit has ever been an indweller in any orthodox church. It is of the opinion that the creeds of all ecclesiastical churches are quite too contracted to retain any spirit, unless a very evil one.

It is not surprising churchmen are discouraged. Turn which way we may indications of departed glory are apparent. All remember the piteous appeal of the Evangelist Moody, on the eve of the new year, for help. He prayed to God loud and long to make a demonstration of his power, by arousing the church to activity. Where are the converts? Here and there maniacs have been posted off to asylums, family feuds have been engendered, numerous murders have followed; but somehow real, genuine, old-time revivals, with sinners trembling, saints shouting, the ransomed singing, and the godly begging sinners to come forward to be prayed for; while the younger sisters, with the hands of the sinners in theirs are weeping, and imploring them to be seated on the mourner's bench and be saved, seem not to have been the order of exercises in any part of the country. Moody and his lieutenants have never labored harder; but the Holy Spirit would not respond to their importunities.

Col. Ingersoll, the stalwart anti-Christ, finds overflowing houses wherever he lectures, and the people pay generously for hearing him. The church is attempting to boycott the halls in which he speaks. If such halls are closed larger ones are opened to him. Every movement to silence the Colonel has resulted in giving him larger and more interested audiences. So great was the pressure on his time he was compelled to abandon the bar that he might fill lecture engagements.

On second thought we are inclined to the opinion that if the Holy Spirit was in any way connected with the churches it has actually withdrawn therefrom, as the Reverend Doctor alleged, and has gone over to Colonel Ingersoll. It is well known the old pagan gods used to get disgusted with those they served, and would occasionally go over to the opposite camp. They had many characteristics in common with the Christian's God; they were as changeable as those who made them, repenting and sorrowing for the past, loving to-day and hating to-morrow; they peopled the world, then drowned the inhabitants. And now it would seem, our "Holy Spirit" has fled to the "great scoffer." Well, well, well, who thought it would do so so soon?

SETTLED AT LAST.

Rev. Dwight L. Moody came to Chicago quite recently to save sinners, and he flatters himself he has done a grand work at the Auditorium. That staid old daily, the Chicago Journal, of April 1, "All Fool's Day," tells of the revivalist's work. Among other good things the aspirant after pentecostal days refuted all the scholars and all the critics who have spent long lives in their researches to learn the truth about the Bible. This heavenly athlete has no need of learning or of facts. His bare assertion, with multitudes, is better than history, than logic, than science. Here is the Journal's report:

"The evangelist declared that every book, every chapter, every verse, and every line of the Bible was true. He accepted and demonstrated even the Jonah and the whale story. Unbelievers—and there were many in that vast audience—were conquered, for the time at least. Christians were re-armed against the Devil. "Give up your life but don't give up the Bible!" shouted the evangelist in a voice full of command and warning. The church-members stood ready to do it."

Scholarship does not count in a contest with such a man. Faith, blind, unreasoning faith, is the only guide with such a person and his deluded followers.

MODERN AND BIBLE LAW.

"Whoever. . . . shall sell or offer to sell or keeps for sale any flesh of any diseased animal or other corrupt or unwholesome provision shall be confined in the county jail not exceeding one year, or be fined not exceeding $1,000, or both, in the discretion of the court." —Statutes of Illinois.

"Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself: thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien: for thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God."—God, Deut. xiv:21.

It seems there are those who prefer the latter law, because it was enacted by God, and is part of an incorrect Bible.

A SENSIBLE CHRISTIAN.

A learned writer in the Quarterly Review, devotes thirty-two pages to the discussion of the "Lord's Day," and has brought logic and fact to his support, favoring the opening of museums and galleries of art to the people on Sunday; making the day one of happiness and pleasure, instead of darkness and gloom. Discoursing on the Jewish observance of their Sabbath, he says:

"There is no hint before the [Babylonian] captivity of any Sabbath service other than the sacrifices of the Temple, which were followed by feasts. The only references to offense or shortcoming with regard to Sabbath law are to engagements in what we call business or servile work." The writer goes on to show how a rigid observance of the Sabbath was developed until:

"Nailed shoes may not be worn on the Sabbath, for this would be to bear a burden; grass may not be walked upon, for if bruised it would be threshing; the lame may use a staff, but not the blind; a horse may be led by a bridle, but it must not be loaded by a saddle; and he that leadeth must take care not to let the bridle hang so loose that he may seem to bear the bridle rather than lead the horse."

That was the priestly interpretation of the Sinaitic law. The writer then shows how the Jewish Sabbath was transferred to the Christian Sunday, and became a season of rejoicing; that it gradually grew into a sacred day among the Protestants after the Reformation, who fenced it around with the most rigid restrictions in England, Scotland and Holland. His closing words should be pondered by Christians, for it is very apparent the trend of religious thought is to an enlargement of the uses of the "rest day," making of it a period of gladness and joy, instead of sadness and grief. We quote:

"Our own investigations have led to the conclusion that the opportunities for worship and rest which the church first won from the State in the opening years of the fourth century, are a priceless privilege which should be maintained at any cost; that the ceremonial of the fourth commandment has no application to the Lord's Day, and, apart from dark days of bigotry, whether Roman or Puritan, has never been held to have. The term Christian Sabbath is unknown to the first twelve centuries of Christian history. The term Sabbath, as applied to the Lord's Day, is unknown to the Articles, the Canons, and the Prayer-Book of the Church of England. The Christian idea of the day is of worship, refreshment, rest, peace, joy, liberty. The duty is therefore incumbent upon every Christian to claim these privileges for himself and for all persons committed to his care, and, as far as in him lies, to obtain and preserve it for the whole brotherhood of man. Many eminent Christian teachers have rejoiced during the past year to welcome as a step in this direction the opening on Sundays of the chief public museums and galleries of art in London."

If churchmen would discard their narrow conceptions of a holy day, and allow Sunday to be used for purposes of rest and joy, as this Christian writer has shown it was in its early history, then there would be no hostility to Sunday. Let those who enjoy sacred music, prayer and praise, collect in the churches, and revel in them to their hearts' content; let those who prefer to worship in "God's first temples," bask in his sunshine, or listen to Nature's choristers, the birds, do so; and let those who prefer to visit antique collections, attend theatres, listen to lectures on science, or remain at home with family or books, enjoy these pleasures, and that without molestation from bigotry, then the world will be worth living in.

DANCED WITH PRETTY GIRLS.

It appears from incontrovertible evidence that our idolized George Washington, on great occasions, used very emphatic words to express his ideas, language which the preachers send common mortals to hell for employing. Yet in face of all this the churchmen have sainted the patriot, sage and statesman, and claim him as of their number but occasionally, to make points for themselves, they tell the truth.

Over at Rockford the other day the Methodist ministers from all over the country were in attendance on the Rock River Conference there in session. Among them was Rev. Dr. Waters, who, the papers said, was a typical Virginian, with snapping black eyes, and was a fascinating speaker. In his opening discourse, said the Republic's report, he drew a humorous parallel between his own and Washington's journey from Virginia to Boston, and the difference in the two entrances into the modern Athens, remarking that Washington danced with pretty girls on the way, while he, Rev. Waters, did not indulge in that pastime. At this the presiding elder proclaimed: "Praise the Lord." It may be taken for granted the elder wanted the Lord praised because the Rev. Doctor did not dance with the pretty girls.

Rev. Abercrombie was rector of the Episcopal church in Philadelphia which Washington usually attended during his presidency. He made the statement that the President was in the habit of leaving the church at the close of the sermon, not remaining at the sacrament which followed. He preached a discourse in which he suggested it was a bad example for persons in high places to retire on such occasions. He said Washington was displeased at being "preached at," and said he would not offend in that direction again; and he did not, said the rector, because on such occasions he was never present during any part of the service. Dr. Wilson, who reported this interview, says: "Reverend Abercrombie, in emphatic terms said: 'Sir, Washington was a Deist!'" That is to say, the Father of his country believed in one God, but did not believe in any virgin-born Lord. Such a man had a right to dance with pretty girls, they consenting.

GOOD SENSE.

Is it not possible little Elsie was right after all? Her mamma had chided her for having neglected to say her accustomed prayer on going to bed the night before. She concluded her gentle reprimand with:

"What do you think God would say to you were you to meet him this morning, for your neglect to remember him and ask his blessing before going to sleep?"

"He would say, 'Don't mention it, Elsie,'" replied the budding skeptic.

VANISHING POINT IN SIGHT.

According to the Congregationalist, during the last six years the theological students in German Universities have decreased from 4,527 to 2,956—a diminution of over one-third. The causes are ascribed to a weakening of faith through extreme liberalism, and the overcrowding of the ministry. At the same rate of decadence for a series of years, and the vanishing point is not very remote.

A LIE OVERTAKEN AT LAST.

When collusion among witnesses is suspected during the trial of a cause, on the suggestion of the adverse party the court will send them out of hearing of the witness being examined. In extreme cases all may be kept separate from each other until the evidence is closed. Many a nice scheme to defeat the ends of justice, aided by a rigid cross-examination, has thus resulted in exposing a deeplaid plot of crime.

The preachers in these times, with no general head to direct schemes of fraud, are too numerous to successfully practice the old-time arts of the profession. For many years they have claimed that infirmaries, hospitals and schools for medical learning owed their origin to Christianity, as has been heretofore shown in these columns. They have repeated the assertion so often, and with such pertinacity, they seem to have convinced themselves they were telling facts.

It is an axiom that "children and fools tell the truth," and this to the discomfiture of their superiors. Without classing Rev. DeWitt Talmage with either of these, he, unwittingly exposed the falsehoods of his colleagues, in his sermon of the 28th ult., from the words of Paul: "I am debtor to both the Greeks and the barbarians." In that discourse Talmage gave a brief sketch of Hippocrates, the reputed father of medicine, and said:

"He was the father of all the infirmaries, hospitals and medical colleges of the last twenty-three centuries."

Hippocrates died 361 years before the alleged birth of Jesus. Should not the testimony of this witless witness, and he a Christian, the most unscrupulous of his sect, though scholarly, put this foundationless falsehood of fiction-makers forever at rest?

DYING HATE.

A distinguished major-general of the American Revolution, in his will, quoted on page 34, volume 2 of the Life and Times of Washington, said:

"I desire most earnestly that I may not be buried in any church-yard, or within a mile of any Presbyterian or Anabaptist meeting-house; for since I have resided in this country [he was a native of Wales], I have kept so much bad company while living, I do not choose to continue it while dead."

When the Indian chief, Hatney was captured by Velasquez, and was condemned to be burnt alive, he was told that by embracing Christianity he could go to heaven. He inquired if there were any white men there. Answered in the affirmative, he replied:

"Then I will not be a Christian; for I would not go again to a place where I must find men who are so cruel."—See Prescott's Conquest of Mexico, p. 165, vol. 1.

ANNIVERSARY AT CANTON, OHIO.

The Spiritualist meeting was opened by the reading of the poem, "The World Is Moving On." Mr. E. J. Bowtell, the lecturer, said: "We have been considering external observances practiced by religionists of the various sects. There is one now to be considered which the regulators of the religions consider of the greatest importance. This, the duty of public worship, is so essential to the professors of religion that all other observances pale before its overweening importance. We will now bring that observance to the attention of those professing the faith called Spiritualism; and unlike some of the observances before noticed, we find this to be of true importance: Do Spiritualists profess their faith? Aware from actual experience that the so-called dead can communicate, they imagine that it is enough for them to hold their faith without acknowledging it before the world. We, on the spirit-side, implore those on the earth-side to publicly acknowledge their faith. This coming together with minds intent on one thought, will give the cause proclaimed by the public assemblage of Spiritualists great strength, for, if the exercise of one human will be of such potency, how great the power of the many assembled with one intention. The better the intention, the stronger the power that goes with it.

"Come not seeking self—that is the element not of union, but of disunion. We, individualizations of the divine spirit, are yet but one in the great whole. As we with our spiritual vision survey assembled congregations, we behold each one's dominant thought portrayed—each seeking his own will. Let self-love be eliminated, and the fraternity of humanity and the law of the divine be the one thought of the assemblage. For, as you assemble, so you depart. So we say to all Spiritualists, come together for the worship of All-Good.

"We would throw down to you the life-line which would save you. Will you cling to that line and leave the perishable things of earth?

"O, how sad the condition of one who has lived for himself! He has laid up treasure which must remain on earth, while he is torn from it.

"We are in the temple of the living God, for we are in the universe. Therefore, we say, may humanity be blessed, uplifted, and come to know the power of life, and may everything that interferes with soul-development be overcome."

MRS. E. J. BOWTELL.

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION.

To the Editor:—Will you kindly allow space to note the meetings held every Sunday afternoon and evening by the colored medium, Miss Thomas. The meetings last Sunday being the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, Miss Thomas took for the subject of her lecture, I. Samuel, iii, and drew a very clear and pretty connection between the child medium, Samuel, and the Fox children several thousand years later. The calling of Samuel by the Lord "spirit" was very nicely told and explained through the lecture, and brought down to the present day by reference to the different prophets, "mediums," in the Old Scriptures and the followers of Christ in the New Testament, and since to many that have given evidence of their gifts of mediumship as public men—notably Lincoln and Blaine. The hall, corner of Washington Boulevard and Paulina street, was crowded in the evening even for standing room, and the interest was manifest from the fact that all remained to the close of the lecture, when Miss Thomas punctuated the lesson by many remarkable tests. 49TH ANNIVERSARY.

Special to The Progressive Thinker.

THE ROCHESTER COVENTION AND "THE HYDESVILLE HOME."

To the Editor:—Your correspondent left the city of Norwich, Ct., on the afternoon of March 29th, arriving at Rochester, N. Y., at 4 a. m., the following morning. We made the New Osburne House our headquarters, and found it to be one of the best kept hotels in the United States. On Tuesday morning at 10:30 we went to Fitzhugh Hall, the place where our Spiritualists friends were in session, considering the feasibility of holding next year the Fiftieth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism in Rochester, and making the occasion one long to be remembered, and to consecrate anew the "Rap," as the messenger of science, and the harbinger of good will to man. Some divergence of opinion seemed to obtain as to whom the management of this desired celebration should fall—whether the N. S. A. should run and financier the undertaking, or whether it be left to the control of the local society and its friends. The pros and cons were entertained by the chairman, Brother Kates, and a spirit of fraternal courtesy seemed to pervade. The vital issue was, whether the local society and its abettors, would not have more influence with the business men of Rochester, in securing donations, making special railroad rates and hotel reductions, or whether the N. S. A. as a corporate body solicit through the Rochester Chamber of Commerce and railway managers such aid and concessions consonant with so large a convocation as this especial celebration would call out. The matter is still unsettled and will be considered duly by the friends of the movement in all of its local and official bearings.

At 11:20 a. m. the convention listened to an able essay by Brother Morrison, of Ithaca, N. Y., whose fraternal sympathies would extend in true Christian spirit the right hand of fellowship and the spiritual philosophy to the world; and whose advanced years and poetical brain, softens into rhythmical measure the needs of the hour. In the afternoon short speeches were the order, led off by Brother Lyman C. Howe, and followed by others, your correspondent being included.

In the evening, Brother Rabbi Weil opened the services with prayer, after which Lyman C. Howe gave one of his characteristic lectures, entitled "One World at a Time." In this lecture Brother Howe suggested that whatever may be the thought of the materialist, the affairs of this planet and its inhabitants depended upon the sun for light and heat and the constellations of space for the recurrence of the seasons and their fruitage; that the changes promoting vegetable growth and animal life, regulating the seasons and their atmosphere, affording all types of existence continuity, do not belong to the realm of "one world at a time," but to the mutations of myriads of central suns and their co-related systems. The lecture was timely, and keenly enjoyed by a very large audience. Other speakers followed, the writer of this closing the evening session with a brief talk upon the philosophy of co-related forces of Nature.

HURRAH FOR HYDESVILLE.

Wednesday morning at 8:20 found fifty-one of our number at the station, where a special car was attached to the Eastern bound train which took us to Newark, N. Y., about thirty miles east of Rochester. The train runs within half a mile of the celebrated Hydesville home, but the station must be fully a mile or more away. Carriages, hacks and an omnibus conveyed those who desired to ride, to the cottage, which at the present time is vacant. Wm. Hyde, son of the former owner, and who is the present proprietor, was the host of the occasion. Securing seats, benches and chairs from a schoolhouse near by, putting up a stove to warm the chilly atmosphere, and many other acts of fraternal courtesy, were not lost nor will they soon be forgotten by the Spiritualistic pilgrims assembled. Brother Howe gave us an inspirational poem that ought to have a place in the progressive literature of our philosopay, and as a souvenir of the occasion, that many besides those present would enjoy.

Mrs. James R. Sanford, formerly Miss Leah Fox, daughter of David Fox, who is the brother of the Fox sisters, is a writing medium residing at Newark. Being present, she went under control and wrote two messages, one signed A. L. Underhill, formerly Miss Ann Leah Fox, one of the daughters of the Fox family, and sister to Margaretta and Kate, and the other was signed Horace Greeley. The first message received reads as follows:

"Good people, I am with you to-day. I will enlighten you all I can, for I am the spirit of one gone that you all know. While on earth, I prayed for development to be made, that might prove the truths you know must be true. Work for the cause, loved ones. I am with you all, my dear friends, in my spirit."

Signed A. L. UNDERHILL.

The other message reads as follows:

"My spirit cannot tell all I would like to say. Never, was I so happy to think the cause must be brought forth, must come to light. Our dear ones on earth must know that their departed ones have not gone to a world of everlasting death. * * * Each person here has a loving spirit gone to the other world, and they all want to say something. So it is very hard to control a medium intellectually. However, we must say something that will let you know as a fact, that we are all with you to celebrate this Anniversary of Spiritualism. I am a spirit, and one that you will all be glad to know, and enjoys a spiritual belief in the 'other' world. You know the spirit of

HORACE GREELEY.

After a picnic dinner, a few remarks were made by the writer of this, and by Mr. and Mrs. Kates, after which a vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Hyde.

THE COTTAGE.

The cottage is a plain old-fashioned story-and-a-half building, facing the Northwest and is about eighteen by twenty-four feet square. All of the inside partitions are made of inch boards, and the stairway is a very plain old-fashioned affair of half a century ago. A summer kitchen is on the back side of the house, made of common boards. The house with its attachments and belongings is the same as when the "rap" first disturbed the slumbers of its occupants, save that of color, which today is green. Formerly it had no paint. I could not help thinking that here out of humble circumstances had been born to civilization its greatest truths and its greatest minds. The story of Franklin with his kite reaching into the clouds for a bottle of electricity to harness to possible industries, in connection with the philosophical postulates of "Poor Richard," is known to the Thinker. The poverty of Morse as he struggled to give to the world of commerce the telegraphic system and its alphabet, is a matter of history. And the rap, rap, rap, at the Hydesville home, aroused the dormant faculties of thought throughout the length and breadth of our civilization, and when the world of thought can be made to comprehend that the rap of the telegraphic key and the "rap" from invisible life have their mysteries solved, and their secrets revealed, by a clear comprehension of electricity as the vehicle for the transference of all modes of motion known to time and space, and conscious volition as the operator of lines telegraphic and psychopathic, the relations between a world of commerce, and a realm invisible will be known as the basic truth of all time.

BROTHER KATES AND WIFE.

We cannot close this article, without saying a word of commendation for the success and rhythmic flow of this convention, so much of which is due to the thoughtful management and active effort of Brother Kates and his estimable wife. Little matters of practical value in the various details of a convention received that prompt attention which predistinguishes a successful management. From beginning to end the convention was a great success, and the local press, be it said to their credit lent their columns to the aid of the movement. This was achieved largely through the manly influence that Brother Kates during his brief stay at Rochester, has had upon popular opinion, and through this channel, upon the press. We wish that more of this courtesy of kindly spirit, and executive excellency, could represent the practical details of the philosophy of Spiritualism everywhere.

THE ANNIVERSARY AT CANTON, O.

The Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism was celebrated here last Sunday in an appropriate manner. The celebration was held in the large parlors in the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Tiffany, 335 West 10th street. During the services in the forenoon addresses were made by E. J. Bowtell and Jacob L. Beilhart. The morning services consisted of appropriate addresses, readings, singing, etc. When the dinner hour came, about forty of those who were present adjourned to the large dining room and partook of a bountiful supply of the good things of earth that never fail to satisfy, please and fill up the inner man

At 2 p. m., a joint seance, free to all, was held by Mrs. Tiffany, Mrs. Elsie Reynolds, George Renner and Charles Miller. Mrs. Tiffany and Messrs. Renner are home mediums. Mrs. Reynolds is one of the strongest materializing mediums in the country, and has been doing some excellent work here. Many through witnessing the phenomena in her seances have been convinced of immortality and have joined our ranks. I will not at this time attempt to go into details of the seance, but one thing I wish to say, is it was grand. Sunday evening Mrs. Reynolds held one of her grand phenomenal seances in the parlors, for full form materialization, to about forty people. I was told by one who kept count of the materializations, that sixty-five distinct forms materialized that evening, and among them were a number who had passed out from Canton, and were readily recognized by mortal friends who were there. Our attention is now given to organizing, and a good organization we must and will have in the near future. With Brother J. L. Beilhart as leader, and a number of other good and determined workers with their shoulders to the wheel, success is assured.

A meeting has been called for Friday night of this week, at Assembly room, City Hall, to complete the organization. When I say, that in the near future we will want speakers, I feel well assured I voice the sentiments of all earnest workers in the cause here; but those speakers must come well recommended.

Large Attendance at Society Hall Sunday Evening—Eloquent Address by Mrs. M. A. Root.

Society hall was filled on Sunday evening, the special occasion being the observance of the Forty-ninth Anniversary of the Development of Modern Spiritualism. The principal address of the evening was delivered by Mrs. M. A. Root, of Bay City, and was both eloquent and logical. Mrs. Root showed that the belief in survival of the individuality after death, which is the most important doctrine of the Christian churches, is based entirely upon alleged spiritual manifestations. There are, she said, over two hundred cases of alleged spirit manifestations reported in the Bible. The philosophy of Spiritualism she set forth clearly and forcibly, showing that it lifts the souls of those who accept it upon evidence out of the pit of terror in which the creeds of churches hold mankind, to a level where they can know themselves as they are, and God as He is—the universal life and soul, perfect in all things. No one can cast his sins upon another; he must atone for them himself and work out his own salvation.

Mrs. Robinson followed Mrs. Root with a few eloquent words, suggesting the highest moral and religious sentiments. Mr. Frank T. Ripley closed the meeting with tests, most of them recognized under circumstances which precluded the possibility of collusion.

All the Christian churches of the city were represented among the audience.—Port Huron Times.

THE PEOPLE'S HOME SPIRITUAL SOCIETY.

To the Editor:—The People's Home Spiritual Society, at Bricklayers' Hall, Sunday evening, March 28, celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism with very interesting exercises. The hall was filled with a large and interested audience.

Brother G. L. S. Jenifer, the president, introduced the programme, as follows: Dr. D. S. White gave the opening address, which was highly instructive. A congregational hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," was followed by a recitation by Mrs. Mueller, entitled "Thirty Years With a Shrew." Piano solo, Miss Henrietta Grout. Mrs. M. Rogers, original poem. Mr. S. W. Fallis favored us with the cigar box mandolin and violin solos. His act as a musician amused all. Mrs. Peters sang and gave spirit tests. Mr. H. M. Trench, test medium, demonstrated spirit communion. Mrs. Delos Hill sang. Miss Della Ashby, six years old, in a beautiful recitation delighted all. Miss Dollie Jacobi closed in psychometric tests.

Dr. J H. Randall, ever pleasing and popular as a delightful and scientific speaker, closed the services. His remarks encouraged all advocates of our glorious philosophy with enthusiasm. The whole event will be remembered by many friends. Brother Jenifer extends many thanks to all participants. All did well. Thus closed another year in harmony. G. G. W. VAN HORN.

ANNIVERSARY IN BOSTON.

HOW THE DAY WAS CELEBRATED AT CASSADAGA.

To the Editor:—Celebrating the advent of Modern Spiritualism at Cassadaga Camp, has become a yearly custom looked forward to with pleasing anticipation, participated in with earnestness and zeal by believers and defenders of the cause.

Sunday, March 28th, was the day of grace in this year, 1897.

The first atraction on the very attractive program was a musicale on the evening of the 27th under the management of Professor B. H. Bowen, assisted by the Fredonia Male Quartette and local talent.

Sunday evening dawned bright and beautiful, bringing a fair concourse of people to mingle with other visitors and residents that filled Library hall.

Hon. A. Gaston, the association's President, who graciously consented to act as chairman of the day, presented in a brief introductory applicable to the occasion, the speaker of the forenoon. Mrs. Clara Watson, of Jamestown, N. Y. The topic of her very able discourse was "Practical Spiritualism," the opening thought of which was the absence of drilled methods and systematical education received through sectarian colleges, among spiritualistic speakers, the greater portion of whom were taught by ministering angels. Then followed a passing notice of the growth of Spiritualism since its humble birth forty-nine years ago. Though scorned, persecuted and constantly ridiculed, it has steadily advanced in power, influence and numbers of adherents, this being especially true during the past year as the result of efforts of the N. S. A.

The raps heard at Hydesville have reverberated over the wide earth, revolutionizing thought and belief, and demonstrating that the grave is not the end of man's existence but the entering portals to the broad avenues of eternity.

Reference was made to recent founding of societies and organization of churches. Spiritualistic churches might be a good thing in their way, but there were many Spiritualists who looked upon this innovation as a retrograde movement. Certainly it was singular that just on the eve of the Fiftieth Jubilee of Spiritualism there should be a return to the old forms, rituals and ceremonies against which this movement has all along been battling.

Regardless of charlatans, fakirs, foes within and foes without that like barnacles fasten themselves on the ship of Spiritualism, it has plowed right on in its noble mission of enlightening the world. The world needs Spiritualism with its hope, its philosophy and phenomena as well. Despite all opposition it cannot be crushed, even though as a distinct separate movement it may in time disappear, the principles it involves will live forever. Whatever tends to elevate is of practical good.

Spiritualism presents the most useful knowledge that has ever come to the world. It has removed fear and dread of death, has performed a practical part in inventions, revealed through dreams, opened the avenues whereby the sick have been healed, evil spirits cast out and the dead been raised. It has taught humanity the laws of health and happiness, confounded the wise with its teachings, has entered the soul, freeing it from fetters; proved that life is eternal, opened the doors of occultism, assisted in the popular criticism of the Bible, taken part in all reforms of the age, and still greater things will it accomplish for its scope of usefulness is broad as the universe.

Theology banished the soul to a cold and far off, unknowable place, science laid down her knowledge at the gate of death; Spiritualism alone has brought the knowledge that life is eternal, until to-day the voice that dares say man is not immortal is drowned by the multitude who proclaim the glad tidings.

Spiritualism has never shed innocent blood to propagate its cause, and while it has not accomplished in its forty-nine years what the church has failed to accomplish in eighteen hundred years, and while it has no visible center, no colleges, no creed, it is a mighty and potent factor for good the wide world over.

Spiritualism is not antagonistic to anything that is noble, pure and good, but it wars against wickedness in high places and low places; it wars against hypocrisy, against the rulers of darkness of this world; it wars against the powers of the land that give ease and luxury to the few and tramples the many under their feet as serfs and slaves; it wars against class legislation that fills the coffers and treasuries of the few and turns the millions homeless and pennyless into the streets as beggars, paupers and tramps. It wars against the corporations and combines that were it in their power would clutch from the heavens the glorious sunlight and dispose of it at so much per cubic inch, and bottle the atmosphere that none should breathe only as they were given permission by the money magnates of the world. And it will continue to war until slavery in every form has been swept from the land and the starry old banner wave o'er a land that is free indeed. Spiritualism will continue to battle until truth shall triumph and justice and equity be written in the hearts of the people.

The afternoon address was delivered by the eloquent and scholarly Dr. W. W. Hicks, of New York, whose subject was the same as that of the morning, Practical Spiritualism, along eminently practical lines. Said the Doctor, the Hindoos teach an eight-fold path. We Spiritualists recognize a six-fold path, namely, the glorious eminent God; man's conscious union with this God; the spiritual universe; intercommunication of spirits; human brotherhood; life of the spirit.

The Doctor said it was his purpose to remove as far as possible clouds and doubts as to what is Spiritualism, there is nothing modern in Spiritualism except the uses put to it through ignorance or sin. The soul and the genius of Spiritualism is as old as God. All religion is based upon it, and all who think they have discovered something new are ignorant of the old. This is the most superstitious age the world has ever known; it is also the most immoral, and is not the most religious age.

Nothing except Spiritualism in its true definition of philolophy and religion will ever lift the race above its present conditions..

Spiritualism is not a cult or system of doctrines, it would be impossible to formulate it into a creed. Creeds are human inventions. Spiritualism is the science of the soul. No man has the monopoly of truth in this atmosphere and zone, it is as boundless as the perpetual gulf stream of eternal love.

No man can interpret Spiritualism that is not spiritual; then how can he manifest or demonstrate it? He would but demonstrate his ignorance, not knowledge. A knowledge of the eternal truth of God, will make you like unto him.

I protest in the name of Spiritualism, and I am not a youngling, against the abolition of God out of Spiritualism. There is a great difference between religion and superstition. Nature, intuitive revelation unite in declaring the imminent God, Not Jehovah, Jesus Christ, Buddha—none of these are the eminent God, the source of light, the essence of light, the source and essence of life, the source and essence of love, the source of Spiritualism, the substance of Spiritualism. You cannot put your fingers on an atom that you do not come in touch with this God. God is the essence of power, He is eminent, breath of breath, shine of sun, soul of force, He is substance too.

The doctrine of the eminent God is the primal doctrine, the foundation without which there is no Spiritualism.

I have no respect for a science or religion that excludes this God. Coming by chance belongs to no philosophy under the sun.

It makes me sick to hear Spiritualists, ask for tolerance from the nation, church, or society. We should be on the affirmative side, we have nothing to ask, but everything to give.

If you tear and rend one another, you hurt the heart of the father, for we are from him and in him, and he can only make himself manifest through us. Our union with him is as the echo to the voice. Instead of it being an unheard of doctrine that we commune with spirits, it is the only doctrine that has sustained the changes of time.

I have no sympathy for the man who not only denies the possibility but also the necessity of spiritual communion, for every man or woman, consciously or unconsciously, has such communion. If this fact were only realized and understood, we would see a difference in this world in the twinkling of an eye.

If you really believed this awful truth that you are united to God by the same subtile tie that binds you to wife and child, and that you come in touch with this God, and were conscious of such contact, you would be a different and better man, a better woman. You think you do believe this, but you do not—you may believe it intellectually, but intellectual acceptance of a truth is one thing, to feed upon it in the heart is another. We can come in touch with these invisible forces and feed our souls with the bread of eternal life when we will—when we are worthy—when we are in a plane of correspondence with them.

The sixth and last great affirmative is human brotherhood. Some are willing to admit kinship with saints and angels—but deny relationship with people outside their own exclusive set.

Man's cruelty to man is because he does not recognize the universal tie of kindredship; if you are a genuine Spiritualist, a child of God, you will listen to the cry of your brother or sister.

New things are good in their way, but this law of the brotherhood is very old, and it is high time some one should resurrect it, especially since the church has gone into politics and politics has gone to the evil one.

One who lives the true philosophy of Spiritualism is a dispenser of good—a healer to the sick. Its practice will keep off the cholera and black plague, prove a quietus to alcohol, and human hells.

A granite Spiritualist never does an injustice to another man; a backsliding Methodist or Presbyterian, not sure of election, might; but a true Spiritualist couldn't wrong a brother, trample on the heart of a woman or smirch the character of an innocent child—not seek to ruin the chances of another to accumulate a million for himself. The ideal Spiritualist is never cruel—always tolerant, gentle and suave. No evil can exist in a community where consolidated affirmative good predominates.

Never render evil for evil—don't fight fire with fire. You can spike the gun of your bitterest enemy, at long range, by simply looking at its muzzle.

Begin to live and practice here and now what you believe—cultivate the angel within, the angels of your own home and community, thus making possible your existence with the angels in the life to come.

A Thought Exchange in the evening completed the exercises of the occasion.

THE FOX FAMILY.

To the Editor:—Having observed that encyclopedias and writers differ somewhat in respect to the age of the justly celebrated Fox Sisters, and while administering to their physical needs for the last ten years of their lives, I did succeed in getting their correct ages, although they were very cautious not to divulge their ages. A statement was made at Hydesville, April 11, 1848, by the mother, Margaret Fox, and neighbors who first witnessed the phenomena called Modern Spiritualism. This was so correct that the eldest sister, Mrs. Ann Leah Fox Underhill, embodied it all in her book entitled "The Missing Link," except that which would give a clew to their ages.

I am well aware that their age is of minor importance compared with the facts and phenomena produced through their instrumentality and the deductions therefrom, still, as Modern Spiritualism in its effort to enlighten the people of earth is comparatively young and is destined to attain a great age, it will be well to have the record correct.

Margaretta Fox Kane, born October 7, 1833.

Catherine Fox Jencken, born March 27, 1837.

March 31, 1848, Mrs. Jencken was 11 years, and 4 days old.

Mrs Kane was 14 years, 5 months and 24 days old.

Mrs. Underhill was 34 years old.

The statement did not give any clew to Mrs. Underhill's age, but Mrs. Kane informed me that her sister, Mrs. U., was 20 years older than herself, which was subsequently corroborated by Mrs. Underhill.

Dates of their departure to the higher life: Parents—John D. Fox, January 10, 1865; Margaret Fox, August 3, 1865.

Ann Leah Fox Underhill, November 1, 1890.

Daniel Underhill, September, 1891.

Catherine Fox Jencken, July 2, 1892.

SPIRITUALISTS EVERYWHERE DULY CELEBRATE THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY.

ORGANIZATION.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE FIRST SPIRITUALIST SOCIETY OF NEW YORK CITY, SUNDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 28, 1897, UPON THE OCCASION OF THE CELEBRATION OF THE 49th ANNIVERSARY OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM, BY MILES MENANDER DAWSON.

When a man finds out that there is something in spiritual phenomena, he is at once astonished that he or anybody else should have failed to discover it before; and the further he delves, the more astonished he is when he learns how many great minds have already investigated and found something worth the toil.

And after that, that there should be anybody on the outside who, in spite of great accomplishments in other directions, considers that there is nothing in spiritual phenomena, is to him nothing short of marvelous. I must confess it is so to me. I am astounded that such a man, for instance, as Prof. T. C. Chamberlain, the geologist of Chicago University, should have declared the other day before the students that "science stands perfectly helpless in either proving or disproving the future state of the soul after death."

My astonishment is the greater when I reflect that this opinion, expressed by a man who has not endeavored to investigate the subject at all, is controverted by the testimony of the secretaries of both the English and American Society for Psychical Research, and by such eminent scientists as William Crookes, Camille Flammarion, Alfred Russel Wallace and Elliot Coues, for instance.

I cannot help contrasting the dogmatic ignorance of Prof. Chamberlain with the assertion of Alfred Russel Wallace, after years of patient investigation, that spirit return "is quite as well proven as are the facts in any of the other sciences."

But the contemplation of these things shows that there yet remains much to accomplish. The time allotted to me today is entirely too short to discuss what yet remains, in all its phases, even were I capable of dealing with so vast a subject. I believe that it was Alfred Henry Lewis who said of Ex-President Cleveland that what he did not know about law would fill a very large library. It is safe to say that what remains to accomplish is similarly immense, and I know as little of it as Cleveland is charged with knowing about law. However, I do not intend, notwithstanding the sounding title of my address, to endeavor to deal even in outline with this vast subject. It is my purpose only to indicate what remains yet to be accomplished through organization; for another of the marvels is that Spiritualism as an organization has amounted to so little and it so nearly defenseless before its enemies.

It was to be expected, of course, that it would meet the bitter opposition of the church, which could only retain its hold upon the people so long as it appeared to be sole master of the secrets of the hereafter; but that it should not have been welcomed by scientists and freethinkers has been a surprise and a disappointment.

I have quoted to you from Alfred Russel Wallace and from Prof. Chamberlain, whose opinions appear to be as wide apart as the poles, although both professing to be scientists. I think that I can now read to you a quotation from a spiritualistic writer of the sort which makes it next to impossible for scientists who have not had the time and opportunity to investigate for themselves, to accept spirit return. The quotation reads as follows: "Your psychic emanations generate the house spider, the bedbug, the roach, and various other plagues not know of in past ages, and each such creation is the effect of a particular kind of thought. Malice creates the spider; lust the roach; [illegible]ness the bedbug; dishonesty the mouse, etc."

This is perhaps a little worse than some other things which we are compelled to encounter; but there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of them which are nearly as bad. Wherever they go as representatives of the opinions of those who credit what is considered by many, the modern superstition of spirit return, they render the readers and hearers positively certain that this must be a superstition, and a very childish and silly one at that.

It is because of these things that not all of the best minds which have demonstrated to their own satisfaction the fact of spirit return, are willing to connect themselves with Spiritualism as an institution. It would be a very painful thing for instance, to a man like Elliot Coues to be ranked, with some appearance of fairness, with persons who dogmatize in that irrational and inconsequential manner. It must be a very disheartening thing to such men as Hudson Tuttle, Willard Hull and J. Clegg Wright to find themselves among such associations. I know that every fibre of my being protests and remonstrates against being so classed.

These things, I take it, explain in a large degree, why it has been so difficult to institutionalize Spiritualism. Another reason has been the endeavor to copy existing forms of institutions, namely, the churches. The church idea does not adapt itself readily to scientific uses. Imagine, for instance, an evolution society organized on church lines! Although evolution as a scientific principle is now generally accepted by almost all physical scientists, you probably could not get a very large number of its followers into such an organization. The church idea is not overwhelmingly with scientists.

Science does not readily institutionalize. Truth which is truth because it is true, and not because the salvation of souls depends upon believing it whether it to be true, the deadliest enemies that mind lightly and not too firmly. It is accepted in a plain, common-sense way. Most men do not care very much to propagate it; they are satisfied to know it themselves. Of course those altruistic souls who never perceive a truth without yearning to communicate it to others, are exceptions; but most men reflect that what others think about it will not alter the truth, and so decline to make themselves the targets of criticism by championing the truth which they have found. They consider that, if another refuses to see it, he simply fails to have the use and enjoyment of that truth, and nobody is hurt but himself.

This leaves no nucleus for Spiritualism as an organization, except the desire to encourage others in a modest and not too insistent manner to investigate for themselves.

If this be true, and I certainly believe it to be true, the deadliest enemies that the spiritualistic organization has are those who invest truth with a big T, and teach "not like the scribes and pharisees, but as one having authority." They would have men to think that truth is inspired into man instead of found out by him. It is historically demonstrated, on the contrary, that, so long as the world held this view, it did not find truth at all; and that since people gave up being enlightened and proceeded to investigate, they discovered those great scientific truths which have made modern progress possible.

Dogmatism and assertion have no place in modern Spiritualism if it is to be the exponent of demonstrable spirit return.

There is especial danger at this point owing to the fact that spiritual bodies have been compelled to steal the livery of the church in order to avail themselves of the privileges accorded that last refuge of superstition. The forms of service are often closely modeled after church services, and in many cases already the titles of clergymen have been travestied by spiritual speakers. It is but a step further, and a step often taken, to dogmatize, like any other preacher.

If the propagation of truth depended upon organization, this would be profoundly disheartening; but, instead, the eclipse of truth is oftenest accomplished by institutionalism. Men who rally to the standard of falsehood and undemonstrable theories, need to organize; truth can vanquish through naked and alone. In fact, institutionalism is largely the foe of truth, inasmuch as men co-operate only by compromising and truth admits not of compromise. A thing is either so, it is not so.

In view of these things, there is nothing to disappoint in the failure of institutions. Facts have been drawn to the light, and the truth demonstrated by them must be seen of all men. You will see the result, not so much in the success of a new institutionalism as in the decay and alteration of the old. Already the Christian church has so accommodated itself to the conditions of the times that the orthodox of 1,900 would have been excommunicated by the orthodox of 1,800. The discovery of the fact of spirit return has had much to do with this.

It will have more to do; and, in the course of doing it, there is room for organization, provided only the organization be directed toward action and not toward dogma.

Those who know that the departed live and can communicate might, for instance, to advantage co-operate to support in a respectable manner the most valuable mediums. This they could do with economy to themselves and advantage to society, by removing the best psychics from the necessity of competition. They could thus control the actions of such mediums and could set up a higher standard than is possible under competitive conditions.

The advantage of this would not be confined to themselves nor to the respectability which it procured for the individual medium and for Spiritualism, but would extend also to the tremendous advantages that could be afforded to scientists in carrying on their investigations.

Moreover, men can organize to study, not being charged with the necessity of holding the same views at all or of arriving at the same conclusions. When thus organized, they may join to employ instructors and may share the cost of remunerating them for their services. There are abundant fields of study in connection with spirit return. The old code of morals, for instance, must die with the religious superstition which gives it sanction. Spirit return will give a new basis upon which to posit ethics. It will expose an end to be attained; and, from that moment, the true principles of human conduct may be discovered by considering to what degree certain lines of conduct tend toward fitting one for disembodied existence.

The import of this can readily be seen. Morality is the principle of right action. Right action is direct action, accurately adapted to secure an end. If death ends all, the end to be secured is one thing; if death is but the beginning of an endless existence, the end to be secured may be quite another thing. Thus the development of a new system of morals hinges upon this important truth of future existence. Two classes of men are content that things should be as they are. One of these are those who, like Prof. Chamberlain, I suppose, are convinced without evidence that men do not live beyond death and that there can be nothing known about it; and the other are those who believe without evidence that men do live beyond death and are certain that nothing can be known about it. There is a complete harmony of indifference on the part of these complacent individuals. Against this, the intellectually curious, who are never content not to know, must array themselves.

If it did no more, the spiritualistic organization could, by all means within its power, encourage investigation. It could urge this upon the ground that even though it proved fruitless, in the sense that the future life were not demonstrated, it is only by studying the extraordinary in mental action that we can know what the human mind is and what are its limitations. The old commandment "Know thyself" applies to all men. This is a work which the spiritualistic organization has accomplished to a very great degree and is now accomplishing everywhere. It can and should perfect it; and, whatever the disappointments, it is well always to reflect that truth does not require multitudes to defend it. It is not gregarious; it flocks alone. One need not fear for it because only a few—and they despised—rally to its standard. To do so would be to confess that it was no more potent than superstition, which has always required an army at its back to enforce its dominion over men

ANNIVERSARY.

CELEBRATION AT INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA.

To the Editor:—The Forty-ninth Anniversary of modern manifestations of the spirit is being duly observed in this city, and many of the more advanced and liberal-minded people are manifesting a willingness to be known as advocates of the broader and more rational idea that all peoples are one great brother and sisterhood, and ignoring that early Christian idea that some are children of Light—children of God, and others children of Darkness—children of Satan, even though it be recorded that the Nazarene declared: "Ye are of your father, the Devil," and many of them are apparently willing to render substantial aid in sustaining the hand of those who are holding aloft the bright banner of spiritual freedom, and keeping the fires burning upon the altars. May the light continue to spread abroad until every city, hamlet and hearthstone shall be blessed with its hours of communion with the loved ones gone before, and all the world may know of a truth that this life is but the vestibule to the great home of life eternal in realms of immortal glory.

We are open for engagements any place in Indiana, Illinois and Missouri for the months of May and June. Mrs. Hayden is employed at the Peoria (Ill.) camp for the month of July; will serve the society in the capacity of public test medium. Will be glad to correspond with societies who need workers, either speaker—inspirational, psychometric and clairvoyant tests, private readings, diagnosis of diseases, etc. Terms very reasonable.

BEN F. AND M. E. HAYDEN.

Good nature is the very air of a good mind, the sign of a large and generous soul, and the peculiar soil in which virtue prospers.—Goodman.

THE SPIRITUALISTS.

THEY CELEBRATE THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY AT THE MADISON AVENUE TEMPLE, ANDERSON, IND., WITH VARIOUS EXERCISES—A MEMORIAL TO THE UNFORTUNATE SPIRITS.

The Forty-ninth Anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism was celebrated yesterday in every civilized country in the world.

The Anniversary was celebrated by the members of the Madison avenue Association at their temple with an enthusiasm and vigor surpassing any similar meeting that was ever held there. There were three services, forenoon, afternoon and evening. The rostrum was beautifully decorated with flowers and flags and bunting. In the center a cluster of flowers forming an arch was the word "Hope," dedicated to suicides and other unfortunate spirits.

The morning service was conducted by Mrs. Pfunter, of Cincinnati, assisted by Mrs. E. R. Nickless, of Chicago. Each delivered brief lectures. Mrs. Nickless reviewed the progress made by Spiritualism since its advent forty-nine years ago.

SHADOW LAND.

Mrs. Pfunter spoke of Shadow Land, the abode of suicides and other unfortunates—a place of semi-darkness where these unfortunates' souls are doing penance. In a word this understood as a place of punishment—not a place where the fires are not quenched and the worm dieth not, but a condition into which the conscience refuses to be satisfied until full reparation is made for the violation of spiritual or other laws. The speaker said that this mental suffering was not necessarily eternal, that all souls would in time become purified and fitted for the society of the pure and good in the land of spirits. That we as mortals in the flesh could do these unfortunates an inestimable amount of good by extending to them our sympathy and kindly feelings, that in token of our love and regard this bower of flowers had been dedicated and that in consequence thereof these denizens of Shadow Land would be advanced very materially in their journey to the land of light and gladness.

Following the lectures tests were given by each medium. During the tests given the spirits of two unfortunates asked for recognition, both of whom were recognized.

In the afternoon an entertainment was given by the children's lyceum. A Spiritual Lyceum is the Spiritual Sunday-school, a place where Spiritualism is taught by persons who have qualified themselves for that kind of work. The program consisted of songs, recitations and instrumental music and brief talks by Mrs. Pfunter and Mrs. Nickless. The lyceum is under the supervision of Mr. Bolander.

AN UNUSUAL MEETING.

The evening services eclipsed the previous services of the day. By 7:30 the house was full of people and a half hour later the house was crowded to its utmost capacity. President McKee announced that this particular portion of the day's exercises would be of a memorial character. Mrs. Pfunter lectured for forty minutes and was followed by Mrs. Nickless, who came upon the platform carrying a bouquet of lilies. The speaker announced that Mrs. Annie Orvis, an excellent lady and medium who served the Madison avenue Association some three years ago, was now in the spirit world, having passed over while sojourning on the Pacific coast some weeks ago. The speaker paid a glowing tribute to the memory of the late lecturer, Mrs. Orvis. She said that the latter was present, that she was anxious to greet her many friends.

Mrs. Pfunter then after a brief talk gave a number of tests. During this part of the services the house became unusually quiet, though filled to its utmost limits. Then the spirit of a suicide took possession of the medium and talked for several minutes.

"I am Charles Barger, of Lexington, Ky., and there are persons in this audience who knew me."

The medium afterwards explained that these unfortunates were drawn to this meeting for reasons which are set forth in the foregoing.

NOTES.

A solo sang by Miss Audry Bolander at the opening of the evening services was the subject of much favorable comment.

Mrs. Pfunter, who has served the society for the past two months, goes to Rochester, Ind., to serve the society of which Editor Bitters, of the Daily Republican, is president.

Mrs. Nickless will serve the Madison avenue society until May 1st, when Mrs. Pfunter will return and remain for a month or longer.

ORIGIN OF SPIRITUALISM.

Forty-nine years ago Modern Spiritualism was born in Hydesville, State of New York. There are many persons who know nothing of Spiritualism or its origin. To others it is a sealed book, a mystery which they do not care to solve. But the fact that in the period of a half century this new religion has spread all around the world, having for its adherents men and women of every walk of life, the philosopher, the astronomer, the scientist down to the most humble citizen of the kingdom, empire or republic, this fact it may be repeated, makes the circumstances attending the discovery that the dead may communicate with the living, of special interest to a very large number of persons.

John D. Fox, wife and two daughters, Margaretta aged twelve years and Kate aged nine years, lived in the village of Hydesville, N. Y. The family heard strange noises at frequent intervals. These noises, rappings, as they have since been termed, could not be traced to any natural cause. On the 31st of March, 1848, when raps occurred, Miss Kate Fox imitated them by snapping her thumb and finger. Then she snapped her finger a couple of times in succession and two raps came in response. It was soon discovered that whatever it was that produced the raps was possessed of intelligence for when Kate requested this mysterious something to rap once for each year of her age there came immediately in response nine raps. Various experiments were afterwards made, but nothing occurred except in the presence of these little girls. The family moved to Rochester, N. Y. and later to New York City, where these girls were placed under test conditions in the presence of scientific men with results clearly establishing the fact that man is immortal and that under proper conditions communication between this and the unseen world may be established, that the so-called dead are not dead at all but if anything more alive than ever and that they return to the living with words of comfort and the assurance that there is in store for every man and woman who has lived a good life a home and a life beyond the grave where opportunities for mental and moral culture abound and where there is no limit to the mind's possibilities.

Faith is letting down our nets into the transparent deeps, at the divine command, not knowing what we shall take.—Faber.

Studies in Spiritual Thought

THOUGHTS FOR OUR ANNIVERSARY—THE WORLD BEAUTIFUL OF THOUGHT—FOOD OF ANGELS—THEIR THOUGHTS OUR AMBROSIA—SACRED INSPIRATION—THE SOUL'S FINER EXPERIENCE—THE LIVING WORD—IT IS EVER SPOKEN NOW.

It was a fine conception of Dante—and not a mere flower of poesy, but the kernel of a beautiful spiritual truth—when he advised that men eat angels' food, and not content themselves with the kind of food they share with the brutes.

The ambrosia of the mythical gods may be realized as a sweet fact in our everyday human experience. "Man does not live by bread alone," said Jesus, "but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God"—a saying that is too high and broad and inclusive to be narrowed down and compressed within the compass of the ordinary theologian's definition.

LARGENESS OF INSPIRATION.

The word of God is not limited to any script or book—it includes every inspiration of light and truth and goodness that enters into man's inner consciousness, enlarging, clarifying, exalting and developing his mental, moral and spiritual nature.

How infinitely little do they know of inspiration, who limit it to the words of ancient seers and prophets, or the words of a written or printed book, and shut out all the world of thought and beauty and spiritual significance beside!

For there are fine ideals of spiritual beauty and goodness, subtile impressions come to one as glimpses of heaven—coming to us, entering into our consciousness as we sit in quiet revery—such as no script or printed page can ever convey; and these are as truly and sacredly an inspiration as any word that ever came to an Isaiah or a Paul of old.

THE FINER WORLD.

In her fine inspirational way Lilian Whiting says there is a finer world that interpenetrates that in which we live. Its ether is in the atmosphere we breathe. It is the world of reality, of force, of vividness, of power. Now it is not only they who have passed on beyond the things of sense who live in this world, but it is one in which the higher self, the ethereal organism, may live, even before it leaves the body. Everything in this natural world has its spiritual or ethereal counterpart. Nature perpetuates herself in more delicate yet more potent forms. The ethereal body which man assumes at death is a counterpart of the body here; it has the same form, only that it is etherealized. It is not less, but more real. It has to do with a higher range of correspondences. It is a worker on a higher and more important plane of life. Science has demonstrated the existence of the finer atmospheric ether in which this finer body lives and moves. There is a world touching and mingling with ours, in which lie the springs of power. Most people live sometimes and fragmentarily, in this world. They recognize moments, hours, days, when event and sequence become rhythmic, when the vision shines clear and the voice is heard. Now if it be possible to so live one day in the year, it is possible to so live 365 days in the year. If it be possible for one hour a day, it is possible for twenty-four hours.

THOUGHT CONTROLS EVERYTHING.

This intensity and exaltation constantly records its impress on the air; that is, in this finer ethereal world. The deed is the outward and momentary expression; the motive and purpose are the inner and permanent elements that build up life on the invisible side. He who holds his purpose true to this higher end of life is creating new conditions that will ultimately transform all circumstances. There is no limit to that which he may accomplish. He holds the key to the unlimited stores of energy.

All aims of a high character bring into being their own ways and means. Every noble purpose holds its own right of way.

Nothing conduces more to the holding of the days to a standard of significance than the quiet half-hour alone at night, just before retiring. It is possible to absolutely create the next day in this time of silent, concentrated energy. Thought shapes and controls everything. Events are plastic to its stamp. The succeeding day may be created on the preceding night—may be forged out of love, harmony, and energy. Any writer may experience the almost miraculous results of this form of ante-suggestion.

It is this ethereal world which is the world beautiful the world in which all potencies are stored, from which every form of progress, success, and happiness can be drawn. It is the world wherein all who live the life of significance may dwell.

KEY TO A HAPPY LIFE.

The key to a happy life—one that is full of serene exaltation—is to fill the days with significant experiences. The choice rests with one's self entirely. It may seem a thing largely and almost inevitably dependent on circumstances, but it is not; for thought is greater than circumstance or event, and dominates them. Significance or insignificance in the quality of life is, like good or evil, a matter of personal choice with the individual. It is possible to eliminate the inane hours and make every day tell in its purposes of fulfillment. Nor is this possibility restricted to the city dweller, in the heart of all that which is finest in art, literature, and ethics. It is a matter of individual choice rather than that of individual opportunity.

SOUL'S FINER EXPERIENCE.

In the fullness of the soul's finer experience one comes to realize that in a high and true sense, a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of things that he possesseth." There is a life engrossed with the accumulation of earthly goods—which things are good and necessary—but are best when used to minister to the higher nature and not merely for the gratification of worldly selfish desires; but the finer spiritual life takes small account of material riches, valuing most the things that pertain to spiritual grace and unfoldment.

The greedy money-grubber, who finds his happiness in amassing gold, is in a hell, as viewed from the higher mounts of spiritual life and light.

It is better to dwell in the upper stories of thought, than in the dark and dank basement, or the underground cellars and caves of unspiritual earthliness.

It is necessary in this life to see to the concerns that pertain to our own well-being here; but it is possible, while paying due attention to these things, to live a life not wholly absorbed in things of earth—to live, in truth, a life whose realm is the world spiritual, the world beautiful, whose thoughts and aspirations are in close conjunction with the thoughts and aspirations of the angels of purity and spiritual goodness.

The thoughts given us by the spirit-world—pure, uplifting, soul-elevating—these are our ambrosia, the food of angels, brought from heaven for us.

In closing these thoughts, that seem to me to bear a special significance on this Anniversary day of the modern spiritual dispensation, that has brought the spirituality of the spirit-world into closer conjunction with the life and thought of this world, and is, as it is listened to, lifting men and women to higher altitudes, and clearer, vaster visions of the life that now is and that which is to come, permit me to present in verse these thoughts for your consideration:

THE LIVING WORD.

O, deep within the human soul
The far eternal echoes roll;
In the Life-Spirit's wondrous plan,
To make man, God becometh man;
And even so doth God create
Himself, in forms or low or great;
Becomes a flow'r, to make a flow'r,
And manifests His wondrous pow'r
In self-creation—God alone
The being's self of all things known.

The thought that moves within, to-day,
Is echo of eternity;
From far eternity it 'rose
And to eternity it flows.
Within the precincts of the soul
The thought-bells of the Ages toll;
The echo of the Ages gone
Rings in the living Present's tone.
The thoughts inspiring you and me
Are children of eternity.

The past its lessons had, to meet
And guide the olden children's feet
In onward way; its word hath wrought
To aid the onward march of thought.
Above the old and far away,
Attend the voice that speaks to-day;
To-day hath word for present need—
Whoso is wise that word will heed.

Tho' man to Past and Future bow,
Eternity is ever Now.
The heart of the eternal years
Throbs in man's present hopes and fears;
In being's memory we bear
Th' eternal thought and life and prayer.

The ancient prophets grandly spoke
The words that on them clearly broke;
Yet clearer thoughts man's soul shall fill,
So shall be grander scriptures still.
No bible man hath writ or heard
Can circumscribe the Living Word;
Nor Jewish script nor Christian creed
Can fill the world's vast human need;
Of grander thought and larger grace
The Bible of the Human Race.
The soul, with heav'nward reach and look,
Is more than church, or creed, or book.
One soul that may with soul converse
Outweighs a soulless universe.
The highest thought of human mind
Is voice of God; in truth defined,
Uttered in highest self-control,
God's word is word of Human Soul,
Interpreting to age and youth
Its grandest visions of the truth.

CELEBRATION BY THE BEACON LIGHT SPIRITUAL CHURCH.

Beacon Light Spiritual Church observed Anniversary Day with two services conducted by G. F. Perkins and E. S. Perkins, at 617 N. Clark street, Sunday, March 28.

The platform was beautifully decorated with growing flowers and vases of cut flowers, evergreens, mottoes and pictures appropriate to the occasion.

No hall in the city could have more tasty and spiritual appearance; compliments from the audience were numerous. An introductory lecture was given at both meetings by G. F. Perkins, comparing the past with the present condition, religiously considered, of the people. The quality and quantity of the audience was favorable to the question of the hour, and showed approval by generous applause and favorable comments at and after the services.

Mr. Burdick, a North Side medium, gave a very enthusiastic address; Mrs. Bromwell, remarks and tests; Mr. Knoth, two beautiful piano solos.

Miss Patty, a talented elocutionist, favored us with an excellent recitation, also Miss Waters rendered an original poem, "The Forty-ninth Anniversary."

Tests, songs, poems and readings were given by Mrs. Perkins, whose organism was absolutely controlled in rapid succession by spirits Theodore Parker, Luther Colby, Dr. Storer, John C. Bundy, Col. Esterbrook and George Gilbert—each established their identity beyond a doubt, by remarks appropriate to the occasion.

Many thanks to the donors of flowers and pictures. The meeting will continue indefinitely at this hall.

ANNIVERSARY AT LEONIDAS, MICHIGAN.

To the Editor:—We as an association wish to say to the readers of The Progressive Thinker, that we are still progressing, and that we did celebrate the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, Sunday, March 28, 1897. Dr. H. C. Andrews was with us and gave us three very fine lectures, and we think he did us lots of good. He is a first-class speaker and a perfect gentleman. He also gave some very satisfactory tests after his lectures. We can safely recommend Dr. H. C. Andrews to those who may wish to secure him for work. JAMES R. LOWTHER, Leonidas, Mich. Sec. L. S. A.

ANNIVERSARY.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., SOCIETIES.

To the Editor:—The writer took occasion to attend the several meetings held in Lincoln Hall in this city by the several Spiritual organizations, on the event of the Forty-ninth Anniversary of their faith, and I feel like expressing myself as highly gratified with the proceedings. The committee on exercises certainly should be congratulated upon their fitness, as demonstrated in their meetings. As far as observed we saw no clash in their efforts. System, evidently, was manifested throughout all of the proceedings. The selection of Dr. Knowles as president of the meeting, showed good judgment, as everything passed off satisfactorily, which is often otherwise when the presidency is deficient in parliamentary knowledge.

The selections, both musical and literary, are to be highly commended. We feel like mentioning the services rendered by Mrs. Francis L. Sanborn, of this city. How well her efforts were appreciated, can no better be expressed than by the encores repeatedly given her. To a spiritual meeting her voice has the effect to harmonize all within hearing, and often wafts the listener beyond the turmoil of this earth into the happy realm of the departed. By especial request, at the closing services, Sunday evening, she sang "Open the Gates, Let Me In," in a manner characteristic of her wonderful powers as a soprano. We wish all societies could be fortunate enough to hear such talent, as its effect, on occasions of this kind, is inestimable.

Dr. J. C. Batdorf gave a fine lecture, rendered in his own peculiar style, which interested all within hearing. His allusion to unity and harmony of organization in this city, certainly was pertinent and should be considered. The attendance and interest manifested towards this anniversary meeting by our people, demonstrate what it is possible to accomplish in this city if united in effort and interest. Will it be heeded?

ANNIVERSARY.

SPIRITUAL MISSION, OF ELGIN, ILLINOIS.

The Spiritual Mission of this city celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary at 163 DuPage street. The mission had arranged for the Academy of Music, but Mrs. Scovell, our pastor, was taken down with nervous prostration, the combined result of grippe and watching by the bedside of her children in their late sickness. She was not able to hold a public service, so her friends met in her parlors. Over seventy-five gathered afternoon and evening. Mrs. Lizzie Jaquet and Prof. Collins, of Chicago, were welcome guests. The afternoon service consisted of short speeches from Prof. Collins, Mrs. Scovell, Mrs. Jaquet, L. M. Rose, Leonard Jucket; recitations by Miss Katie Leggett and Mr. Jucket, closing with tests through Mrs. Scovell and Mrs. Jaquet. A number from the outskirts of the city remained to a basket lunch and held a conference meeting between the hours of 5 and 7:30 o'clock. At this hour the evening service commenced. The rooms were crowded and all showed great interest in the work given.

Mrs. Scovell gave a short address on "Spiritualism, Past, Present and Future." Prof. Collins followed her with an able address and explanation of the book or new Bible called Oahspe. Mrs. Scovell and Mrs. Jaquet followed with tests, all of which were recognized. The event, while a joyful one, was not unmixed with sorrow, it being also a farewell for several months to our beloved teacher, Mrs. Scovell. She has worked faithfully for the advancement of true Spiritualism in our city, and we regret to have her go away even for a short time, but hope to have her with us permanently after the July camp at Peoria. In our work outlined for the coming winter she has promised her hearty co-operation, and we will rest on our oars until that time comes. We wish to extend to Mr. and Mrs. Scovell our best wishes for their success wherever duty calls them. L. JUCKET, Sec.

FIFTEEN CENTS!

PROF. BARRETT'S ADDRESS.

Other Subjects Treated of Especial Interest.

The Progressive Thinker is to be sent three months for 15 cents to all New subscribers.

Spiritualists, keep posted in current Spiritual events.

Why remain in ignorance? Why don't you keep posted in regard to the great Spiritualistic movement? Prof. Barrett delivered an address before the National Association of Spiritualists. It was an important one, and should be read by every Spiritualist in this broad land. We have had his address (which covers three pages of The Progressive Thinker) and five other important lectures and articles embodied in one paper, which we propose to send forth to illuminate the minds of those who have not had an opportunity to read them.

The first page of this paper contains a lecture by Col. Ingersoll, given in a Chicago pulpit. It scintillates throughout.

The second page contains a highly interesting lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on the "Dwellings of the Dead."

The third page has a splendid article on "Science versus Theology," in review of Andrew D. White's two superb volumes.

The fourth page has another excellent lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on "Spiritual Unfoldment."

The fifth page is very suggestive throughout, and is devoted to the "Hindoo Teachers—They Will Try to Capture the United States."

On the sixth page commences Prof. Barrett's admirable address, occupying three pages.

We will also, in connection with this paper, send out another equally as valuable. The first page contains an excellent lecture by Virchand R. Gandhi, a learned Hindoo. The remaining seven pages contain the wonderfully thrilling narrative (founded on facts) entitled, "The Night the Light Went Out," exhibiting many of the inside workings of the Catholic Church. Besides the address by Mr. Ghandi and the remarkable narrative, "The Night the Light Went Out," the first page has an excellent communication obtained through Ouija. The second page has a startling statement in reference to the "Romish Octopus—It Is Winding Its Poisonous Coils Around Washington." The poem on the same page, "The Sad Picture of a Wrecked Human Life," is wonderfully suggestive. The third page has a striking illustration showing how the Romish Church treats heretics. This page and the fourth also have a continuation of the "Romish Octopus." The fifth page has that remarkable poem, "St. Peter At the Gate." Every freethinker should read it. It is full of excellent "points." It also contains interesting facts in reference to the Romish Church and offices. The sixth, seventh and eighth pages have the following: "Monasteries and Convents—Where Those Alive Are Entombed." "Rider Haggard and the Immuring of Nuns." This paper alone is well worth the price of a year's subscription.

Every Spiritualist in this broad land should have these two papers. Our regular subscribers have already read their contents. For Fifteen cents we will send the Progressive Thinker for three months to all New trial subscribers and also send these two valuable papers.

Bear in mind that by New subscriber we mean one who has not been on our list for at least three months. Those of our present subscribers who wish to buy these two papers can have them both now for five cents. All of our regular subscribers have read their contents.

Send The Progressive Thinker three months to some friend, and thus get him interested in the cause. Stamps taken on small orders.

We sincerely hope that no Spiritualist will be dishonest enough, or so dishonorable, as to take advantage of this offer, by continuing his paper when the time expires, in the name of some member of his family (or some one else) in order to get the benefit of this 15 cent offer, on which the publisher does not make a cent.

VERILY, WHAT NEXT?

Under the head of "A New Programme," we announced a radical new departure from the general routine of work assumed by the average Spiritualist paper. We do not follow old established usages unless we are thoroughly convinced that they are the best, which is very rarely the case. We established the original dollar Spiritualist paper, and introduced a new era in the line of Spiritualistic journalism. Others have followed after us, but in all candor the only thing in which they have equalled us, is in the price of the paper—one dollar.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker on the following terms:

The Encyclopaedia of Death and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. The Next World Interviewed at 35 cts. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	$ .45
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	.45
The Next World Interviewed	.35
Total	$1.25

NO. OF PAGES IN EACH BOOK.

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	400
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	400
The Next World Interviewed	250

Each of these books is neatly and substantially bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and as prices go, are well worth one dollar per volume.

Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker.

Remember, please, that in order to obtain these three books for $1.25, you must send along a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker; the paper one year, and the three books costing $2.25. It is the subscription to the paper that enables us to send you these three books at cost.

THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM WAS ALSO DULY CELEBRATED ON THE SPIRIT SIDE OF LIFE, AND GREAT WAS THE REJOICING.

49TH ANNIVERSARY.

HOW THE OCCASION WAS OBSERVED AT DENVER, COL.

The Forty-ninth Anniversary of Spiritualism at the First Spiritual Church was observed in the morning of Sunday, March 28th, by a select audience of the philosophical, inquiring, reasoning, students in occult lore. The church was handsomely decorated with potted and cut flowers set off effectively by festoons of the graceful smilax. The pastor, Dr. G. C. B. Ewell, introduced as the first speaker, Mrs. M. A. Gridley who spoke for nearly half an hour in her earnest convincing manner, her convictions of the truth this day commemorated in its advent, convictions founded on an experience of thirty years in revelations to her own individual consciousness. In part her remarks we quote:

"As we take a retrospective view of the past we see how ready the world of spirit has ever been, if we but make the conditions, to answer the yearning inquiries of the human soul concerning its destiny, on the laws governing its existence. What have the forty-nine years accomplished since the tiny raps announced the presence of the denizens of that undiscovered country? The development has been rapid to the fuller demonstration in materialization, in independent writing, in mental or spirit telepathy manifested in individual message or thought-vibrations, and the grand presentation and utterance of sublime philosophy beyond the power of mortal in his limited sphere of vision to command unaided.

"The various lines of philosophical and scientific research have been extended within this period as never within a given previous one, and evolution and advancement have become established as the inherent nature of creative law.

"The spirits mission is for the relief of oppression on every hand. The Indians, not understood, but living as close students of Nature's laws, surpass us in our artificial building—they can psychometrically trace the veins of gold in the mountains' sides, and read the language of the heavenly bodies, and before twelve months will pass such comprehension may be had of psychic law through our present investigation, that communication may be had between the planetary worlds of which we are one."

This is but the outline of a discourse full of encouraging, sublime thought.

Dr. Ewell followed in a brief retrospective glance saying: "It is but natural that the mind turns back to celebrations of anniversaries of the past—years back when Sister Gridley and myself united with others in the grand City of Brooklyn, and later in various places, with various co-workers—all scattered now in different fields of labor.

"This our Easter-tide brings us together in a church evidencing that by degrees we are establishing our standard of progress, having swept back the mists of superstition and ignorance in a degree, and parted the veil which has concealed for centuries the passage to our life beyond.

"The divinity of true fatherhood and true motherhood has been revealed and a knowledge which is to outrun centuries in the future for generations yet unborn.

"We are not waiting for these forms to be returned to mother earth to recognize our immortal rights and privileges, but here, we are to stand beside the throne of wisdom and according to the advancement in to-day enter the school of ever-advancing progress.

"We celebrate to-day the death of death; we pass into another cycle of unfolding, wonderful still mysterious life; we stand dead to the past, alive to the present; the stone for us has been rolled away—these are the unfolding principles that are lifting us day after day; it is for this we celebrate our jubilee.

"As we gather together with our songs of thanksgiving, it is meet we should remember those who have struggled and passed into the kingdom of a higher life. They may have made mistakes, but they were martyrs who preserved for us this new dispensation and made possible the developments by which we to-day are made rich. Those lives stand as stars in the galaxy of life in the firmament of our existence, and live to-day, not for our worship but for us to imitate and emulate in all fidelity.

"We are standing on the eve of developments more wonderful, physically, mentally and spiritually, and a baptism of power is now awaiting us.

"Do not let us lose recognition of our responsiblities. Let us roll still farther back the stone of ignorance, of egotism, and comprehend the true dignity of the soul which is to outlive all kingdoms, all dynasties.

"Grander powers than we dream of are ours; let us go forth stronger, leading the lives of purity for the power the angels have brought. We shall triumph we shall overcome, and place this knowledge before the world. But let us recognize the power of spirit, and arise in that divinity which is our own and links us with systems on systems of creative life and power."

In the Sunday evening service, the reception of new members was made a very interesting feature, flowers being the symbol of expression made use of by the inspiring forces through Dr. Ewell. Mrs. Gridley gave the hand of fellowship, with her beautiful, loving thoughts.

This was but the beginning of anniversary days—meetings on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday followed, with baptism or consecration of children on the last day, and the Ladies' Auxiliary supper and social in the evening, was the program. A severe snow-storm, an exact counterpart of one occurring last year at the same time, interfered somewhat with the success of the closing day, especially in the financial part of it, but we Spiritualists are so accustomed to financial strains that our lives would not be complete without it. I know our souls grow the stronger for every effort, so we can only have compassion for those who having the means and refusing to contribute, deprive themselves of the growth which comes with effort and suffer atrophy as the natural sequence, and more than that, in this depleted condition they have got to face the accumulation of responsibilities and liabilities some day. They are never avoided but temporarily, but accumulate the greater with interest the longer the payment is deferred.

But your correspondent always gets to preaching, and a correspondent should not preach.

I would add that the Children's Progressive Lyceum celebrated the day on Sunday 28th with afternoon meeting in the Unity Church. The Lyceum established on the South Side was also present by invitation, addresses by Professor Waldron, Rev. Mr. Utter and Myron Reed of Unity Church, ministers of the Unitarian faith. The program was quite interesting, in recitations and music also, but I presume you may have a fuller report from other correspondents and I will forbear.

With sincere love and fellowship in the cause. SARA L. HARD, Secretary First Spiritual Church, Denver, Col.

THE OCCASION AT LYNN, MASS.

To the Editor:—The Lynn Spiritualist Association, J. M. Kelty, president, celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary at Cadet Hall, 36 Market street on Sunday, March 28th, large audiences being in attendance. The desk was tastefully decorated with choice flowers. Upon the platform were Mr. L. D. Milliken, Mrs. Vina Goodwin, Mrs. Albert Lewis, Mrs. Dr. Caird, Mrs. Dr. Chase and Mrs. Annie Cunningham of Boston. Mrs. Cross presided at the organ. After an invocation by Mrs. Dr. Chase, President Kelty welcomed the large audience in a spirited address appropriate to the occasion, followed by above gifted speakers. Dr. G. W. Fowler closed the interesting exercises with words of reminiscence and encouragement. A very toothsome repast had been provided by the ladies in the banquet hall, to which more than 150 did ample justice, after which an hour and a half was spent in social converse and enjoyment of the gifts of the many mediums present.

The evening exercises opened promptly with an increased attendance, taxing the capacity of the hall. The organist was assisted by The Thomas Orchestra, whose several numbers were very much enjoyed, as were all the exercises from the platform by above named speakers and mediums.

The Quarterly Convention of the Massachusetts State Association will be held at the above hall of our society, April 28th, all day and evening. Many gifted speakers and mediums will be in attendance, and a cordial invitation is extended. Admission will be free. Dinner and supper will be served in the banquet hall.

We regret to learn of the sudden transition of our friend and Brother Joseph D. Styles, of Weymouth, Mass., who filled his last engagement with our society March 21st. Mr. Styles possessed a rare phase of mediumship, being gifted in impromptu poems, and giving full names and descriptions, coupled with accurate relationships of decarnated spirits, and is well known all over New England and to those attending the various camp-meetings. A more extended notice will appear later.

THE CELEBRATION AT SOUTH BARRE, VT.

To the Editor:—We wish to let the world know that we keep in touch with the modern movement. Our society celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of our noble cause, Modern Spiritualism. The program was as follows:

The service was opened by a solo rendered by Mrs. Young. Prayer by Mr. Colburn, then a short address by Mrs. Eliza Turner, who has been a medium for many years, and is one of nature's noblest women. Her remarks were very appropriate for the occasion. A lecture and poem read by Miss May West, which was written for the occasion and presented to us by Mrs. S. Woodside, Heuvelton, N. Y., for which the society tender her a vote of thanks. This was followed by a solo by Mrs. Young.

The regular address of the day was then delivered by Mr. Colburn, which was filled with enthusiasm that showed the depth and meaning of our beautiful philosophy. All agreed in ranking this among the best. Mr. Colburn has been our speaker for the last six months, and our meetings have been well attended. We all regret very much his leaving us, as he has to go to other fields of labor, every Sunday being engaged until camp-meeting opens at the park. His first work will be in Heuvelton, N. Y. He is to deliver the oration Memorial Day at Huntington, Vt. We all look forward with pleasure to Mr. Colburn's return in the early fall.

Our hall was most beautifully decorated with potted plants and cut flowers, making the altar look like a place of Paradise.

As evening drew near the ladies of the society served a most delicious repast, which all did justice to and said they had been fed both in body and in mind.

In the evening the hall was given over to the young people, Cook's orchestra furnishing music. They tripped the light fantastic toe, breaking up at a late hour, all going away glad that the angels had returned to let us know there is no death, but life is happiness forever more.

SPIRITUAL FRATERNITY ASSOCIATION, OF PHILADELPHIA.

To the Editor:—For such a young society, the Spiritual Fraternity Association, of Philadelphia, Penn., is certainly doing a grand and noble work in promulgating the good deeds and works in the spiritual cause in this city. In celebrating the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism last Sunday evening (March 28th) we cannot express in words the scenes that were presented, for it brought tears of joy to the eyes of many who gazed upon it. On the wall at the head of the hall were two figures "49" in flowers; under this was a large tri-color with the words "Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism" entwined in a wreath of flowers, to act as a background, a light blue piece of bunting with golden stars was used, on each side of this a fifteen-foot tri-color was draped; slightly away from the stage and running from wall to wall, and falling from ceiling to floor, many colored strips of tinsel were used; the lights striking the same produced an effect that was simply grand. Tastefully arranged upon the stage were numerous flowers and palms, and on each side of the speakers' stands stood a large American flag; on the north, south, and west sides of the hall the American flag was draped everywhere space and good taste would permit. The N. S. A. Charter was also handsomely decorated with flags and flowers.

After vocal and instrumental music by Professor Fowler's celebrated band of Southern Jubilee Singers, President Shillingsburg announced that Dr. C. S. Bates had been requested to act as Master of ceremonies. The doctor in a neat speech accepted the position, and then called upon Professor Seymour who made the opening address, his subject being the Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism. Selection by the Jubilee Singers, and then tests were given by Mrs. Snyder, a well known medium here is this city. The Jubilee Singers again rendered selections, after which tests were given by Mrs. Watson, who is widely known. Vocal and instrumental selections by the Jubilee Singers followed the above, this in turn was followed by tests from Mrs. S. C. Faust, who is the Association's permanent medium. The Jubilee Singers brought the celebration to a close by rendering a number of Jubilee songs.

THE CALIFORNIA SPIRITUALISTS CELEBRATE—PROFESSOR LOVELAND, MRS. LILLIE, JOHN BROWN, THE OLDEST AND MOST REMARKABLE LIVING MEDIUM, AND OTHER NOTABLES TAKE PART.

The California State Spiritualists' Association gave a fitting celebration of the Forty-ninth Anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism at Scottish hall, San Francisco, on April 1st, admission to all meetings being free.

The exercises commenced at 10 o'clock a. m., by the reading of a poem by President Thos. G. Newman, entitled, "There are angels I know," after which he delivered the opening address, dwelling upon the methods taken by the spirit world to bring to the notice of mankind the fact of the soul's continued existence after the change called death.

Professor J. S. Loveland followed with an able address in which he illustrated the marvelous effect that Spiritualism had brought to bear upon the inventive genius and the religious systems of the past half century, and predicted that sooner or later it would supersede all old effete systems, whether social, political or religious.

Other prominent speakers and mediums who took part in the morning exercises were: Mrs. Kate Heussmann, Mrs. May Drynan, Mrs. Harriet Wrenn, Mrs. Lois Waisbrooker and John Brown, Sr. The latter will be remembered as "John Brown, the Medium of the Rockies," whose marvelous experiences as a medium have often appeared both in the Spiritualist and secular press for some three score years. More than a decade before the advent of Modern Spiritualism he saw spirits and foretold future events with unerring accuracy, saving many lives from the Indians by his power on the Western borders of civilization. He presented a very interesting and instructive paper, which was read by his wife, he being too old and feeble to read it himself. Sadie E. Cooke presided at the piano.

At 2 p. m., after music by Professor and Mme Young, Professor J. S. Loveland again lectured, followed by Mrs. D. N. Place, Mrs. C. Mayo-Steers, Mrs. H. A. Griffin, Mrs. Jennie Robinson, Mrs. Eggert-Aitken, Mrs. C. J. Meyer, Mrs. F. A. Logan, Mrs. Dr. Smith, Dr. Webster Hyde and Chas. Anderson, the "Boy Medium," and inspirational lecturer, also President T. G. Newman.

Tests or speeches were given, as "the spirit moved" the mediums, and there was "a feast of reason and a flow of soul." The lyceum question came up and was strongly supported by all who spoke upon the subject, President Newman showing how important it was that children should be taught things they would not be compelled to "unlearn" in later years.

In the evening some fine piano solos were rendered by J. T. Lillie, after which he sang some of his most soulful solos, accompanied by Mrs. Jennie Tulley. Mrs. Lillie then gave a magnificent lecture, folowed by Edward K. Earle, with his startling tests. To him the family histories of all the skeptics present seem to be an open book.

An address by Chas Dawbarn concluded the exercises.

Among the many strong points made by Mrs. Lillie, she said that the antagonism of all classes towards Spiritualism, was due to the fact that the spirits compelled their mouthpieces to attack error wherever found, in the cause of humanity against the usurpers. Had the spirits said to the churches, "You are right; your Bible and theology are true;" then there would not have been a church in Christendom but would have received their long-lost spiritual manifestations with open arms; but because the spirits told the truth, the clergy shrieked, "The Devil," or said it was fraud and imposture; in either case not daring to investigate for fear of discovering a truth.

Another reason Mrs. Lillie assigned as a cause of antagonism, was the fact that Spiritualism came to all classes alike—to the rich and poor, the high and low, the educated and uneducated, and that each individual who was convinced of spirit return, continued on his way with all his preconceived ideas, idiosyncrasies and traits of character, yet proclaiming that he was a Spiritualist; and it is the custom of the world to judge a religion by the worst examples of its advocates instead of the best.

ANNIVERSARY AT FLINT, MICH.

The Forty-ninth Anniversary was observed by the First Society of Spiritualists of Flint, Mich., at G. A. R., hall, beginning the evening of March 27th, by a largely attended supper and a fine program of music and recitations, after which those wishing to danced until nearly time for the Sabbath day to begin.

At 2:30 p. m., Sunday the 28th, meeting was called by President C. M. Hovey. Singing by the choir, recitation by Mrs. Lessie Doty, solo by Miss Kate Bloomer with violin and organ accompaniment. Dr. Sarah Allen gave an address of welcome. The response was given by D. P. Dewey, of Grand Blanc, who has just retrned from California, where he has been some months, for his health. Another solo by Miss Bloomer, after which Hon. L. V. Moulton, of Grand Rapids, answered questions that were handed to the ushers at the door by those seeking the light, and were answered in a satisfactory manner.

Andrew Daniels gave messages from dear ones, both afternoon and evening, and all were recognized.

At 7 p. m., the hall being packed full of people, so there was no standing room—even parlors being filled—meeting was again called to order by President Hovey. Singing by choir, recitation by Professor Cobb, violin solo by Miss Kitty Holly, then Mr. Moulton gave a grand address on the Rise and Progress of Spiritualism. This closed the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism at Flint, and all feel that it was a success from the beginning, the hall being nicely decorated with the beautiful plants and flowers, flags and mottoes. Over the speaker's platform, suspended, was a large silver star, inside of which was a sunflower, the national emblem of Spiritualism.

This meeting also closed a month's engagement of L. V. Moulton. Large audiences have greeted him every meeting and our society is growing larger and stronger.

Lyman C. Howe of Fredonia, N. Y., is our next speaker.

49TH ANNIVERSARY.

SPIRITUALISTS CONGRATULATE THEMSELVES AT DENVER, COL. ON THEIR PROGRESS.

The Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism was celebrated in Unity church, Denver, Col. The exercises were of a varied and interesting character, and the attendance was large. The platform was tastefully decorated with small American flags and banners, while large tropical plants lent an additional charm to the scene. The program included almost everything from an organ prelude to a spiritual test. The exercises were conducted by W. H. Marshall. There were over a thousand persons present.

A number of prominent Spiritualists occupied seats on or near the platform. Miss F. Jeanette Hall performed the organ introduction, after which the congregation joined in singing, "Home of the Soul." Prof. George W. Walrond made the invocation and then delivered the opening address. He said:

"This is a day not only for universal rejoicing, but for universal thanksgiving. It carries us back in memory to 1848. We find a very striking contrast between the conditions that existed forty-nine years ago and those of to-day. We can look back to that time not only in memory, but in spirit, and contemplate the great work that has been accomplished since then. At that time if we were assembled as to-day to celebrate an event, we would have to be guarded by police or military.

THINGS DIFFERENT NOW.

"We could not speak our honest convictions then. Thingsare different now, as the truth will make all of us free.

"The changes that have occurred in the minds and intellects of the human race during the past forty-nine years are the result of the growth of a higher state of spiritual belief. To-day we feel courageous not only because we have been emancipated by liberty, but because our minds have been freed from bondage. The term 'Modern Spiritualism' is a little inappropriate, for spiritual manifestations have occurred since the dawn of creation. The laws of God were the same then as they are now. To-day we celebrate a religion that has in its ranks millions upon millions of believers besides those who are diligently seeking the truth.

"I have seen in my travels how anxious the people are to learn all about spiritual truth. Such was not the case forty-nine years ago. We have much to be thankful for, and the spirits of our liberators are not silent to-day. It is a historical fact that Abraham Lincoln was guided in his actions by the advice of a Spiritualist. Modern Spiritualism is a great and noble religion, and I would ask all skeptics to give it due consideration."

The Rev. Myron W. Reed made a short address. He said: "I like to see a despised cause stand upon its feet in daytime and in the bright sunshine. I saw the day when the best people did not think much of Spiritualism, but I am glad to see the day when it is so highly respected. I remember the day when abolitionists could not get a building in which to hold a meeting, they having to utilize the cross-roads. By coming here to-day I see a respectable assembly in a respectable church. I have lived to see the earth under one law, one love. I believe that the universal is all one house, but divided into many rooms. I recognize that David was right when he said we are all alike. We are growing more alike. I thank my spiritual friends for putting a new phase on death. The last funeral service I attended there was no crepe on the door. I remember when men combined together to make death a horrible thing. Now we go hopefully to the cemetery, which is made beautiful by flowers and by eternal emblems of the resurrection."

Rev. Mrs. A. Brockway delivered an address. She said "Spiritualism is a subject which demands a great deal of attention. I am glad to see so many people interested in what will bring peace and happiness to all their homes. We know Spiritualism is a truth. We see that we are emphatically living in an age of investigation. There is no other age in the history of civilization that has been characterized by such tendency to thought. All the civilized nations are agitated with the thought that man is a progressive being, and that the tendency of the human mind is upward and onward."

THE PROGRESSIVE SPIRITUAL CHURCH.

To the Editor:—The Progressive Spiritual Church, Lakeside Hall, southeast corner Indiana avenue and 31st street, G. V. Cordingley, pastor, celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism on Sunday, March 28th. The hall was beautifully decorated with flags, palms and cut flowers, and a large and enthusiastic audience enjoyed the services both afternoon and evening. The program of the evening was long and varied one, Mr. Cordingley opening with an invocation and poem on "The Spirit Rappings of Forty-nine Years Ago." Professor Faels, of Boston, gave a very interesting discourse on "Spiritualism as proved by the Bible." Max Hoffmann and F. Corden White gave splendid tests and were highly appreciated by the audience. It was clever and enjoyable as was the humorous recitation of one of our favorite Lyceum pupils, Miss Myrtle Bell, who has the promise of a bright and famous future. Mr. Walter Beaton, the phenomenal baritone, sang several numbers in his usual grand way. Professor E. Willard furnished the instrumental music of the evening, which was beyond any criticism.

Mrs. Golsten's recitation on "No Sexton in Heaven" was very amusing. The Progressive church is doing a great work both for the young and old. The children's lyceum is still prospering and we have now upwards of 195 pupils. Every Saturday afternoon there is held at the hall a dancing school where Professor Miller drills the pupils in all the ballroom and fancy dances. Professor Marshall has offered to drill the pupils in fencing. There is something yet in store for next year when Mr. Cordingley and Mr. Miller return from the East.

ANNIVERSARY AT WAVERLY, N. Y.

The Progressive Spiritual Association of Waverly celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism by an all-day meeting Sunday, March 28, in Brother Stone's hall. Conference at 10:30 a. m. E. W. Sprague, of Jamestown, lectured at 2:30 and 7:30 p. m., both lectures replete with truths to stir the laggard in the work and awaken the thinkers and searchers after higher truths.

Monday eve we wound up by a good social time at Sister Russell's, with the parlor crowded with Spiritualists and those wanting to learn, one and all with hearts full of love and good wishes for Brother Sprague in his work, and hoping to have him with us again in the near future.

ANNIVERSARY.

MINNEAPOLIS AND ST. PAUL.

To the Editor:—Thinking that you and the thousands who read your progressive paper, would be interested in knowing how the twin cities of the Northwest celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, I thought I would write you a short article in regard to it.

Mr. and Mrs. Aspinwall of the First Spiritual Society, and Mrs. Braun of the First Progressive Spiritual Church, secured the beautiful Unitarian Church of Minneapolis at considerable expense for the Sundays of March 28th and April 4th for the purpose of holding the services and also to demonstrate whether the Spiritualists and public would attend in sufficient numbers to pay the increased expense incurred in the venture. All societies were cordially invited to be present and take part. Mrs. Lepper, of the Lincoln Band Society, Mrs. Barton of the Unity Society, Mrs. Tryon and her society, Mrs. Courson, Dr. W. C. Gibbons, pastor of the First Christian Science Society, and last but not least the wonderful eleven-year-old-child test medium, Stella Marcotte, all taking part and contributing to the success of the undertaking—Dr. Aspinwall making the opening address and Mr. Millen acting as chairman.

The body of the large church was filled in the afternoon, and in the evening all available space including the galleries and extra chairs were filled. The meeting was a pronounced success from beginning to ending.

Mrs. Aspinwall, who opened the evening services, received many compliments for the clear and concise reasoning exhibited by her guides in handling the subject used them for the half-hour given them, and two gentlemen (a lawyer and merchant) said her voice and gestures were perfect, and that it was the best address they had ever heard from a lady.

Mrs. Emily Leppert, who has been an honest worker in the cause for forty years, and who is loved and respected by everyone, gave some of her many experiences and soul readings which were very interesting to all.

Mrs. Barton followed with an address and tests, every one of them fully recognized.

Dr. W. C. Gibbons made a stirring address which caused hearty and continued applause. He said he knew Spiritualism to be true and that life was immortal. He knew that he has seen, recognized and talked with his spirit wife. Mrs. Courson and Stella Marcotte both gave excellent tests. The services were interspersed with organ recitals by Mr. Leo. Pomery, and vocal solos by Mrs. Weatherby, also grand congregational singing.

On Wednesday the 31st we all went to St. Paul and had a very successful celebration, filling every seat in the large Odd Fellows Hall. Professor Way and Professor Harrow the divine healers demonstrated their power to relieve pain and heal the sick. All the meetings were a complete success, and prove that earnest effort will be rewarded. Continued services in the Unitarian church will be held through April by Mrs. Aspinwall, Mrs. Braun and Mrs. Barton.

Now a few words in regard to our coming camp, which is to commence June 20th and continue through July. We expect a large attendance in July, as all can take advantage of the railroad rate granted the Elks for their celebration, of one-half fare, good for any and all and lasting through the month. We expect to have everything in readiness for the reception of guests at our main camp at the lake July 1st and the auxiliary camp between the two cities June 20th, both running through the season. All mediums expecting to be with us, please write so that we can put them on the program to be issued about May 1st.

THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY.

The Oldest Spiritualist Association in St. Louis, Mo., Duly Celebrates.

The St. Louis Spiritual Association celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism at Howard Hall, 3001 Olive street, on Sunday, March 28th. The hall was handsomely decorated with palms, flowers, bunting, flags and inscriptions. The weather was beautiful, the attendance was large, the interest was strong and all things seemed to combine to make these anniversary exercises especially interesting and not easily to be forgotten. They commenced at 10:30 a. m. and continued through the day and until 10:30 p. m. The attendance in the morning was very large and in the evening the hall was crowded until every seat was filled and a large part of the aisles occupied by spectators so interested that they forgot to be tired. In the morning Mr. Grimshaw, the speaker engaged by the society for March and April, spoke upon Spiritualism, its beginning, its present status and its future prospects.

In the afternoon the lyceum under Miss Hergesheimer, its very efficient conductor gave an entertainment consisting of songs, recitations and addresses which was enjoyed by all.

Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, of Philadelphia, who has been spending a few weeks in our city and who has become greatly endeared to all addressed the lyceum in that earnest, inimitable, colloquial way of hers which at once arouses interest, wins confidence and carries conviction.

Mr. Grimshaw spoke also. He too is highly esteemed for his ability and earnestness, and affectionately regarded for his many amiable qualities.

In the evening there was held a general conference meeting in which the various spiritualistic societies of the city participated through their representatives. The exercises consisted of songs and addresses which were listened to with attention and appreciation as testified by the frequent applause. Neither space nor time will permit even the merest abstract of the many good things that were said. I will only name the speakers, which will be quite enough for all who know them to be sure of the high quality of their remarks: Judge Portis, Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, Mrs. Curts, Dr. Green, Mrs. Price and Mrs. Hadlock, Mrs. Hardcastle, Mrs. Stone, Mrs. Young and Miss Swaine contributed greatly to the occasion by their beautiful music. The only cause of regret connected with the celebration of our anniversary, is the serious illness of Mr. M. S. Beckwith, the president of the society. He could not be with us in body, but I am sure he was present in thought and sympathy All else was most satisfactory, and to crown all quite a handsome sum of money was collected for the N. S. A.

THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY.

M. L. Odell writes from Michigan: "Saturday, March 28, the Paw Paw Valley Spiritual Association held their annual meeting and election of officers. The following were elected for the ensuing year: President, B. O'Dell; vice-president, E. C. Towers; secretary, M. L. O'Dell; treasurer, Nellie Phillips; trustees, J. D. Sherman, Henry Sortor and Etta Sortor. On Sunday, the 28th, we celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary. Mrs. Marion Carpenter was with us and gave a lecture both forenoon and afternoon, followed by tests and descriptions which were well received and all recognized. Her lectures were fine and for a young worker she is fast coming to the front. She also read us a greeting from Francis Woodbury, secretary of the N. S. A. Mrs. Carpenter is a strong supporter of the N. S. A., and is doing a good work for them."

D. G. Carson writes from Rockport, Maine: "The Spiritualists of Rockland, Rockport, Camden and neighboring towns held the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism in Camden, at the Magnolia House, where Mrs. Decrow so kindly invited her many friends to meet with her once more. A goodly number being present, the afternoon was spent in singing and social conversation, with a picnic supper which was enjoyed by all. Mr. C. A. Wheeler, of Rockport, then opened the exercises of the evening with a few remarks, followed by an invocation from Mrs. Smith, of Rockland, then remarks by Mr. Smith, Mrs. Carson, and Dr. Clark. Poems were read by Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Wheeler—it being a very enjoyable occasion to those present."

Interest writes from Allegheny, Pa.: "J. Frank Baxter lectured for the Spiritual Society the last three Sunday afternoons of March. On Sunday afternoon, the 28th, he delivered the Anniversary address in which the great truths of Spiritualism were presented and driven home by a master mind. Mrs. M. J. Crilly has just completed a four months' engagement with this society. Mrs. Crilly, who is a home medium, found the interest lagging and the crowds small when she came here. But at once a wonderful interest was awakened and the audiences constantly increased until the last two Sunday nights when they became too great for the seating capacity of the large hall where the society meets, and many were compelled to occupy improvised seats of almost any description, while others stood throughout the services."

THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY.

The "New Spiritual Church" celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary services last Sunday, and the hall was well filled to listen to the music, tests, psychometric readings, and the subjects, "What is Spiritualism?" and "What Good has Spiritualism Done?" The First Spiritual Union celebrates to-morrow. The "New Spiritual Church" is growing rapidly, and the interest increases. Even those outside the ranks are being drawn away from the old dogmas, and we feel that the line of work we have laid out will make a change in the status of Spiritualism in San Jose. DR. A. B. COONLEY.

THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY.

The Secretary writes: "The Spiritual Society of Maquoketa, Ia., celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism on the evenings of March 27 and 28.

On Sunday evening, Mrs. J. M. Harvey opened her spacious parlors for the exercises, and delivered an interesting lecture on the subject of "What is to be the Progress of Modern Spiritualism?" A few remarks, appropriate to the occasion, were made by others present.

A number of investigators were present and seemed very much interested in our beautiful philosophy. On Saturday evening an elegant supper was served and a fine program rendered for the advancement of our cause. Miss Flora Ramsey, of Eldridge, furnished the music for both evenings."

FIFTY YEARS IN THE CHURCH OF ROME.

A Remarkable Book.

This is a remarkable work by FATHER CHINIQUY. It exposes even to the minutest details the corruption that exists in the Church of Rome. It is a work of 832 pages, and should be read as a matter of history by every Spiritualist. The following is a partial list of the table of contents:

CHAPTER I. The Bible and the Priest of Rome.
CHAPTER II. My first School-days at St. Thomas—The Monk and Celibacy.
CHAPTER III. The Confession of Children.

A Compendium of Spiritual Laws. No. 1, New White Cross Literature.

BY AUGUSTA W. FLETCHER, M. D.

In this volume the author, in the thirty-nine chapters, discusses a wide variety of subjects pertaining to Spiritualism, from a spiritualistic standpoint. She evinces the powers of a trained thinker, both in matter of thought and fine literary style, and capability of thought expression. The subjects are well-handled with conciseness and yet with clearness. It will prove a rich addition to any Spiritualist's library, and a most excellent book for any one seeking information concerning Spiritualism and its teachings.

A MODERN SAVIOR.

HE WHO LIVES IN THE SLUMS OF CHICAGO THAT SHE MAY BE INSTRUMENTAL IN ELEVATING THE LIVES OF THE LOWLY TO A HIGHER PLANE—SHE LIVES THE CHRIST LIFE, ACTS THE CHRIST LIFE, AND CARRIES OUT HER THEORIES WITH THOSE WHO NEED HER GENTLE AND REFINING INFLUENCE — A FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY PAPER.

It is well to read something of a humanitarian tendency on this, the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism. A religion without humanitarianism in it, is without one very essential ingredient or quality. Humanitarianism is needed, needed badly in the world to-day, and particularly in Spiritualism, where the main effort appears to be directed towards the making of proselytes or converts to our belief. But humanitarianism should go hand in hand with Spiritualism—and be an integral part of it—and it will in due time. But here is a humanitarian whom I wish to read about to you at this Home Circle, in Chicago, in celebrating the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism. She is not only a humanitarian, but a Savior. As set forth by the Chicago Chronicle, Jane Addams, a well-to-do lady, has been for the last eight years at the head of the Hull house settlement and the nineteenth ward is not yet redeemed. It is still the land of muddy and unpaved streets, the haunt of unpleasant people, the region of tenement-houses, the refuge of sweat shop workers, the playground of an innumerable brood of factory children.

The point is not that Miss Addams and the women and men who have seconded her efforts have failed in even the smallest particular to do the things that ought to be done. It is simply that a person of rather more than ordinary attainments, or more than common strength of character, has immured herself in an environment quite unlike her, quite alien, quite foreign, has in the fullest meaning of the word made sacrifice of herself, without appreciably changing the condition that existed there at the beginning.

A teacher whose precepts have commanded the admiration of the world and whose own life was a miracle of self-abnegation, once said to his followers: "Cast not your pearls before swine." And something of that general sense of manhood's interest in the actions of one necessarily much in the public eye warrants the student in the inquiry: Has Miss Addams contravened the precepts of the teacher?

"Has it paid?"

That is the question that was asked Miss Addams the other afternoon.

"Has it done any good? Are there results enough to warrant the self-immolation of two or eight or twenty women of the best quality?"

The guiding spirit of the Hull house said that it had paid; that good had been done; that the results achieved had been such as to recompense her for the labor.

WELL FITTED TO WORK.

It is an odd thing, anyway. Miss Addams is a bigger woman than she seems to be when seen on the platform. There is some modest, retiring quality about her when she gets before an audience that lends the appearance of diminutive size. It is good fortune, in a way, for it instantly provokes a chivalrous adherence to her cause. Men and women are a little more inclined to give abundant credit, lend abundant succor, seeing the champion of an unpleasant crusade apparently unequal in physique to the task imposed. But in her sitting-room she is not diminutive at all. She is rather above the average stature of women, and instead of a slight frame that has seemed almost ethereal to thousands of admirers this leader in a new cult is remarkably strong and is fitted to any demands that may be made upon her. And there is probably as little sham about her as about any other woman in town. She knows life. She knows the good side, for she is a part of it and might have remained far from any suggestion of the seamy side. And she knows all of the evil that a good woman brave enough to learn the bad and wise enough to decline it can know.

She looks to be about 30 years old. She may be older. She is not much younger. Beauty is a matter for the eye of the beholder. But she is not an ugly woman. And her voice is as gentle and musical as if untrained ears had never invited to careless enunciation. A woman with fortune enough to pay her own way even here, where every moment is full of demands and income from effort is out of the question, must at the beginning be understood as having made choice of her work. She is educated in books. She has studied and traveled abroad. She has learned many languages, and can speak in any tongue of continental Europe. She knows pictures and knows music. This is the figure that one finds at the head of Hull house—that has been there for nearly eight years, and is not discouraged yet.

SAYS IT HAS PAID.

"You ask me if it has paid," said Miss Addams. "We may as well challenge life itself. What is the good of having these things if we make no use of them? Instead of feeling that I might make better use of languages I wish I could speak in their own tongue to these Russian Hebrews. I wish I knew Greek. I have too little—not too much.

"We might as well go to the priests and point out to them that they have not redeemed the people who live in every direction around them; that in spite of their preaching and service and the example of their pure lives all manner of sin still exists in their neighborhood in some measure and among the very people who are reached by them. They do not think their work has been a failure. They know they have not reformed a man by speaking to him nor redeemed a woman by simply placing the right life before her.

"They have done some good. That is certain. They are doing good every day. Their mission, then, has not been a failure. One might as well challenge them as challenge us. One might as well challenge life itself as to say there have been no sufficient results here because many old conditions still exist.

"The people here are better. They are getting better every day. They will grow better to the end. One may go through the district, and not be able to see any great improvement. But it is here. The number of young women who have different ideas and different ideals of life is vastly encouraging. The number of young men who view the questions of morality and purity as you view them and as I view them has grown. It would not be easy to mass this evidence so it would be convincing to a stranger, to one who simply looked over the situation. But it is here. We who live in it, and are a part of it, know."

She feels that these people need her; that, keen and constant as is their suffering in many ways it would be more keen if she were not here to help them and if she did not help them. And all of this without a suggestion of doing a singular or surprising thing. She says she chose this sort of life freely at the beginning, because it seemed she could do more good here than in another stratum of society.

"There was no use of working among students and the people who had pictures and music and all that in their homes. These people had none of it, and we came here because they had none of it. It is just like the man that was whole; he did not need a physician. And there is another thing. The man that falls fainting on the street will always be taken care of. The very passers that never before saw him will take up a collection. The very excess of his misfortune commands help on the spot, and he receives it.

"But these people were neither equipped for life nor were they at the edge of death. No one was paying any attention to them. And so we began. If I did not believe the work prospered, that it has been profitable, I would quit it to-day. The fact that I am going on with it is the best proof I can give that I have faith in it.

"Sometimes," said Miss Addams, "I get discouraged and blue. I suppose that comes in everyone's life. It seems that it is all wasted, and that there is no help for them. But it is never for long. Surely it does them good. Surely these years of study that many of them have taken, the years of contact with good things, the ideals inculcated, the new habits formed, are something to life. When I get despondent I have only to look at these who have come to depend on what they get here for their only relief from what is undesirable and unhappy. I know they prize it, that it helps them, and so I am reassured."

Sometime Miss Addams believes there will be a municipal ownership of street cars and of the telegraph and of the telephone and of the varied conveniences of the public that are now in the hands of corporations. She does not want it yet. She declares she believes it would be the greatest of misfortunes to place the control of these great industries in the hands of the public as office is now secured and administered. Some time she believes public office will be regarded as a public trust and that men charged with the duty of serving the people will have neither purpose nor wish to debase that service in the interest of personal ends. And until that time she can see no hope in socialism.

One misses the whole current and moral of her life if one regards her as a cultured woman living in the slums. She is a cultured woman, of course. And equally, of course, her house is in the slums. It is a difficult thing to say. But she is one of those people. She does not beckon them from a height nor direct them from a distance. She does not preach, she does not lecture. She lives. And they see her manner of life laid down beside their own. Maybe they will choose hers. At least they will remember it.

She enters into their hearts. She knows their loves and shares them. She knows their interests and seconds them. She is good friends with them. The saloon-keeper across the street is a good friend. He will help Hull house any day. He has helped it. He comes to the meetings. No one tells him: "I am holier than thou." He doesn't keep a very nice place. A man that knows a Mercury from a Venus de Milo when he sees it would have to be very far along before he went in there. But if he did he would probably get the right change and be allowed to wear his silk hat uncrushed on the street.

The women of the neighborhood have long ceased to regard Miss Addams as a dispenser of charity. She is a friend—very close friend—and maybe she can help them. Anyway, they tell her their troubles. And usually she can help them somewhat. She doesn't go away when she has performed the service. She is right there. She is one of them. And so they all love her and trust her, and love and trust the women and the men she has gathered about her.

And it may be that some time the sacrifice of those honest lives will bear fruit of an evident redemption.

Thus we have a modern Savior, one who has established her home in the slums in order that she may be instrumental in reaching more closely those who need her assistance. Let us hope the time will come when Spiritualism will have scores of such humanitarian workers. In fact, every Spiritualist should be a humanitarian, and the millennium dawn will not appear until that condition is achieved.

YONKERS SPIRITUALIST SOCIETY, N. Y.

To the Editor:—The Yonkers Spiritualist Society celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism on Sunday, March 28. Mrs. Helen T. Brigham gave an able address, showing the rapid progress made in free rational thought or mental perception. Since my last report we have had the following inspirational speakers and mediums: Tillie U. Reynolds, Mrs. L. A. Olmstead, Dr. Fred L. H. Willis, Mrs. Harriet M. Rathbun, who favored us for the love and advancement of the cause rather than the nominal sum our young society was able to pay them. We closed the celebration with an entertainment and dancing on April 2, and also the election of officers for the ensuing year as follows: Alfred Andrews, president; Mary H. Mosher, vice-president; Titus Merritt, secretary; A. Andrews, treasurer. Trustees: Mary E. Embree, Earnest L. Gale and Alex Clapperton.

Mrs. Susan Gale, a magnetic physician, who has been doing a noble work for many years in this city, was inspired to write a poem appropriate for the occasion. The Progressive Thinker maintains its high standard as an educator in human progress.

ANNIVERSARY.

The First Progressive Spiritualists' Association of Fresno celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism with "a family gathering" at their hall on Tulare street. A business meeting was held in the afternoon and was followed by social conversation, enlivened by music, etc. At 8 p. m., the assembly was called to order by president pro tem. C. C. Lyon, and a fine program, consisting of vocal and instrumental music, addresses and essays, was rendered. During the program an intermission was taken, and all repaired to the banquet room adjacent where a bountiful and elegant supper, such as Fresno's lady Spiritualists know so well how to prepare, awaited them. Supper over, an hour or two of experience-telling and social chat concluded the day's festivities. Although the stormy weather somewhat interfered with the attendance, those present will long remember the Forty-ninth Anniversary and the 28th of March.

GALVESTON, TEXAS.

THE SPIRITUALISTS THERE DULY CELEBRATE THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM.

The Spiritualists of Galveston entertained their friends and the public with the following program, the occassion being the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism.

Miss Mai and Mr. Ashton Spence rendered an overture on violin, accompanied by piano.

George and Willie Pilford and Percy Wickes pleased the audience with the song and dance, "Three Jolly Sailor Boys."

Miss Georgia Clark's recitation and encore were among the most pleasing features of the evening.

Miss Ida Hancock followed with an instrumental solo.

The play, "It Never Rains But It Pours," by home talent production, was creditably presented by a number of young people.

Mr. Ring spoke with much force and eloquence, explaining many points in Spiritualism and pointing out its elevating influence upon man, both spiritual and material.

Mr. W. L. Hanscom contributed one of his popular selections, "Nita Gitana."

The one act operetta, "Peppery Pa," which was given at last month's entertainment, was repeated and enjoyed as much as at that time.

The instructive feature of the Spiritualist entertainment at Harmony hall was the inspirational lecture by John W. Ring. Following is the address in part:

Friends, no doubt a number of you would feel much pleased if this part of the program be omitted, but I am compelled to impose upon your presence by calling your attention to a few facts along the line of Modern Spiritualism. With the assistance of the dear angel friends who so nobly assist me in my undertaking of this nature, I hope to be able to present something of interest and benefit.

Forty-nine years ago in a quiet village of New York three children—Margarette, Catherine and Leah Fox—were troubled with mysterious rapping. Upon investigation it was proven to be the operation of departed intelligence—spirits. Thus making its advent through children, it was soon realized to be in harmony with the words of Jesus: "A little child shall lead you." The glad tidings of immortality spread rapidly. In fulfillment of the first message received the manifestations of spirit presence were made known in every part of the civilized world.

The early days of Spiritualism were more exclusively devoted to phenomena, for the mind of man was not sufficiently developed to receive the glorious philosophy as it comes to the mental faculties.

Nor do we in any manner neglect due praise to each and every phase of mediumship, whether on the physical or mental plane. While many of our thinkers in the field of Spiritualism seek spiritual food rather than material advice, they never forget to truly appreciate the tiny spirit rap which has brought more direct intelligence and undisputable evidence of immortality in forty-nine years than mankind found in the past eighteen hundred.

The bright, gleaming truths of Jesus were dimmed with the superstition and ignorance of the age until through hope and belief the people tearfully sang "In the Sweet Bye and Bye." But Spiritualism put a new song upon the tongue of man and a more noble aspiration into his heart—the sweet now and now—the ever living present.

From the gentle raps in the Fox family Spiritualism has expanded until now in every land and in every village the soothing comforts of Spiritualism have been felt. Where one medium stood persecuted and scorned there now is an army of chosen instruments under the guardianship of dear loved ones that have taken on immortality, voicing the glad tidings of continued life and eternal progression. Every possible avenue of communication is being opened. Crowned heads of countries across the sea, profound thinkers holding positions of trust and importance, as well as the humble cottager, are seeking the great truth. It brings undeniable evidence of immortality and of intercourse between spirits in and out of the flesh. The numberless instances of spirit communion in the sacred book of the past and history of ages gone proved but a minor part of evidence when the bright rays of truth pierced the gloom of doubt and fear, assimilated the clouds of ignorance and revealed the broad fields of nature as the pages upon which the infinite had written indelibly his lessons. With truth as its eternal corner stone, Modern Spiritualism pronounced man the incarnation of divinity and revealed the wondering, investigating mind as to the possibility of a God and his presence by indorsing the words of the poet:

"Man, know thyself; presume not God to scan.
The proper study of mankind is man."

In the light of truth every kingdom of nature bespeaks the presence of life, which is but the material manifestation of love, and with the evidence of reason and Jesus "God is love." Hence, in the seemingly dormant mineral kingdom we behold the presence of life—love—God.

In the vegetable kingdom we are able to see more plainly the presence of intelligence, beauty and grandeur. More perfectly can we behold the workings of divine intelligence as it is inscribed in the instincts of animal life. And in the human kingdom we indeed see the reflection of infinite wisdom. So we plainly see that the broad expanse of nature proves to be everlasting pages upon which are inscribed the revelations of wisdom, life, love— God. This lifts man from the plane of dependence and causes him to stand erect in the realization of the responsibilities of life. No longer is man a groveling worm of the dust—nor was he ever—but the incarnation of divinity, and this divine life generates sufficient force to surmount the obstacles that bar the shining pathway of eternal progress. The dark environments of life fade into the oblivion of nothingness when the emanations of a pure, God-given soul fall upon them. As Spiritualism reveals the soul in all resplendent grandeur we no longer at the vain attempts of man to measure the worth of a human soul. Realizing that "All are parts of one stupendous whole"—every soul a part of the over soul, we can understand why Jesus urged all to love one another.

As we look about us and see all surroundings teeming with love to us we place ourselves in harmony with the higher laws of our beings and can "see ourselves as others see us," in wisdom read the message of the infinite in the faces of the flowers and the hearts of our fellow men. So as we see mercy and love constantly reflected in all nature we feel the near relationship of our spiritual parent. We truly see that Spiritualism has removed the fear of the past and we approach the everlasting principle, God, with a tender feeling of familiar reverence. Friends, we hereby know that God is ever present, ever demonstrating himself in the kingdoms of nature and in the manifestations of his messengers—the ministering spirits. No creed nor discipline has Spiritualism supplanted on the heights of decreasing priestcraft, the fruit of ignorance and superstition, but offers as a material aid to the young developing minds of humanity the little couplet: "Do good, be good." How small yet so great. All the creeds, all the dogmas, all the conclusions of faith and constant research of ages is culminated in these four little words.

So with consistency we can see that Spiritualism is not the vague, spooky imagination of evil possessed minds, but the most glorious revelation of love. In the forty-nine years of its growth it has found lodgment in the most brilliant minds of this and all nations, because of the simple fact that it brings man face to face with the living present and endows him with strength to glory in victory over every adversity of material life, and when the shades of mortal existence are deepening into the darkness of earthly decay the liberated soul triumphantly glances upon the old deserted tabernacle, as it quietly succumbs to the inevitable laws of nature and returns to the elements from whence it came; enters the brightness of eternal spiritual unfoldment and joyfully shouts as he ascends the ladder of endless development: "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

Friends, while we meet in social and intellectual enjoyment we are watched and guarded by unseen influences, and this responsibility is brought to us.

A mighty law of attraction operates through all manifestations of life in the mental plane with as much vigor and strength as in more gross material planes.

If we walk the way of life with a feeling of vanity and unbecoming pride, constantly casting frowns and selfish thoughts to our fellow men, then we attract a spiritual force that will reveal the thorns to others and in selfishness seek to throw unsurmountable obstacles in their way. But if from the bright morning of life we wear a smile and entertain kindly thoughts for our associates, we, in accordance with natural law, attract kind, gentle, loving influences that conceal the thorns of contention, obliterate the gloom of doubt and fear and reveal the broad expanse of space as a domain of research filled to overflowing with brightness. Then with the effulgent gleam of the torchlight of truth to pierce the gloom of error, superstition, ignorance and the host of gloomy hindrances to human advancement man can be victorious over all.

And with a glimpse to spirit life,
The glories there sublime,
Will win a victory over strife,
Behold himself divine.
Ah! joyous day, thy coming hail,
To bring for all release,
When doubt or fear dare not assail,
And over all reigh peace.

Now, friends, whatever view of religion we may favor, we are none of us seeking for aught more than the emancipation of man from the past ignorance and error. So in the celebration of the Forty-ninth Anniversary of a mighty and glorious revelation of infinite love and wisdom let us, from the depths of charitable hearts join, the swelling strain of the angels as its echoes sweetly sound, "On earth peace; toward men good will."

THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY.

On Tuesday, March 30th, probably the grandest entertainment that was ever given in the Spiritualist ranks of this city, was held in Red Men's Hall.

At 5:30 a grand supper was served by Mrs. P. J. Scalley and Mrs. C. Evitts, assisted by other good sisters in the cause. The supper was free to all, and was served from 5:30 to 8 p. m.

At 6:30, Mr. Haltz arrived with his graphone, and entertained the audience until 8:15, at which time the entertainment opened with a grand piano solo by Mr. Isles. Mrs. Mattie Ogden, president, introduced Mrs. S. A. Leavenworth, who is one of the oldest mediums and workers in the city. Mrs. Leavenworth made some very interesting remarks in honor of the same. Mrs. Ogden then introduced Mrs. Eva R. Cooley, who had the entertainment in charge, and who most ably presided over the same during the remainder of the evening. Solos on the violin and piano, and also vocal solos were very finely rendered. Recitations and songs by the children were fine. Recitations by Mrs. Langdon and Miss Nellie Lownds were most ably handled and loudly applauded. Miss Lownds recited Easter Lilies, which was her own composition. The Chimes, by Mr. Ellison, held the audience in profound silence.

Remarks by Mr. C. M. Cooley, also Mrs. Barnard in honor of the occasion, which were very appropriate, and pleasing. A descriptive song by Mr. Parker, also a recitation were very alby rendered, and well appreciated.

At 10:30, Mrs. Ogden was called upon to give a few tests, which she did. Then she thanked all who kindly assisted in this long-to-be-remembered intertainment and supper.

One verse of America was sung and all returned to their homes with a happy heart and a pleasant memory of the Forty-ninth Anniversary of the tiny raps.

TO THE SPIRITUALISTS OF MICHIGAN.

I have been requested to act in your State as State Missionary, and have consented so to do, if the people of the State desire such work in their State. What I desire is this, I should like to hear from as many places in the State that would like to hold some meetings, and to organize if possible; as well as to hear from as many societies that are already organized and those that are chartered. The object being to create as much of an interest in our cause and organize as many societies as possible, to further the State Society, and collect our scattered forces. I desire to hear as soon as possible from the different localities, so that I can arrange a route, and have some system, instead of journeying so far from one point to another. I will publish the route when I make one out, but do not see how I can come into the State, and not know where to commence. What is expected of the different places I go? I expect the hall to be furnished me and entertainment, and be as liberal in your donations as possible, and in as many places as possible should like to hold several meetings—say four or five. I would try and organize the friends into a society, and if possible a lyceum—in fact I would do anything possible to further the cause.

Now, friends, arouse, and let us go to work with a will and see what can be done in the State. When writing, will you kindly enclose a stamp, as I do not feel I could afford to answer so many letters. Let me say to societies where I am already engaged, I shall fill my engagement, and hold myself in readiness to accept others as they come. If the Spiritualists of Michigan wish the State work, I trust they will now respond. Address me at my home address.

Forty-Ninth Anniversary.

The First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, founded in 1852, celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, on April 4th in a manner long to be remembered, not only by the members of the association, but by strangers who came to listen to the inspired lecturers, who gave utterance to the truths and philosophy of Spiritualism. Warner's Music Hall, with a seating capacity of eight hundred people, was resplendent with beautiful palms, flowering plants and cut flowers, while towering above all was "Old Glory," the pride of our Association.

The Helping Hand Society, connected with the Association, were indefatigable in their efforts to make the occasion an honor to the cause of Spiritualism, and the superb decorations were entirely owing to their efforts. Mrs. E. L. Haslam, our efficient leader with her competent corps of assistants made the music, one of the finest features of the occasion. The well drilled voices of C. L. Smith, Francis Fray, Misses S. Jackson and Katie Brown, together with Mrs. Annie Benner, Mrs. Haslam and Professor J. W. Caume and wife, filled the hall with melody, so that on every hand were encomiums showered upon them for their services.

The leading light of the day was W. J. Colville, who has served this society for four months this season to their great delight. He was at his best on this occasion, and the anniversary lecture was a masterly address, eloquently portraying the progress of Spiritualism during the past forty-nine years, showing that the tiny seed planted nearly half a century ago had taken root and grown to such an extent, that to-day its branches extend all over the civilized world. A synopsis of the address would only do it an injustice. Suffice it to say, that the world should have listened, instead of an assembly of people. Mr. A. E. Tisdale was present in the morning and sang by request, "Only a thin veil between us."

The conferences before each session were well attended and were presided over by Mr. Barry. The speakers in the afternoon were Mr. W. J. Colville and Mrs. M. E. Williams, who delivered addresses in honor of the occasion.

A Lyceum class under the leadership of Mrs. L. Heasley gave an exhibition of their work which was warmly received. The exercises closed with a poem by Mr. Colville.

The evening services were also largely attended, Mr. W. J. Colville being the principal speaker. He was followed by Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, vice-president of the association, who delivered an address befitting the occasion. The large audience manifested a deep interest in her remarks, while as characteristic with her, she appealed to the hearts and sympathies of the people, to uphold mediumship and support the cause of Spiritualism, affirming that Spiritualism embraces all that is of benefit to the human race, and beseeching those present to unite with renewed efforts in order to protect its interests and place it upon a firm foundation before the masses. Mrs. Cadwallader has endeared herself to us by reason of her earnest labors, and always receives a warm reception when she occupies our rostrum, but on this occasion, she received a special ovation, on account of her long absence through illness. We trust that she will soon be able to take up her work again which has for the time been laid aside. The exercises concluded with a poem by Mr. Colville and benediction by Mrs. Cadwallader. Though we have passed through many trials, the members of this association feel that there is much to encourage them, the outlook for the future being bright, financially and spiritually. More interest has been manifested this year than ever before. Long may the white banner of Spiritualism wave, untainted by ought that would mar its brilliancy is the hope of your correspondent.

THE FORTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY.

The Progressive Spiritual Society celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Spiritualism in its usual manner, furnishing its own entertainment, and on this occasion we were more than usually successful. We held an "all-day meeting, an excellent program being given in the forenoon, consisting of music, poems and essays, followed by an address by Mrs. A. C. Woodruff, replete with grand truths. Mr. E. A. Keary gave us an original poem, "The Stones," that was fine. The rendering of the hymn, "Joy to the World, the Truth has come," by Mr. Ludwig and sons, was something long to be remembered. We adjourned for dinner, and here we found that none of the enthusiasm shown during the morning session was lacking, as seventy persons were willing to testify to the ability of the society ladies as cooks.

At 2 p. m., the meeting was again called to order by our worthy president, Mrs. Senda Briggs, who had been absent from us for the past year. A worthy address was then given by S. G. Sheffer, on "A Review of Spiritualism," followed by a poem by Mrs. Stanley, "Why Am I a Spiritualist?" Other poems and essays followed, all filled with much inspiration, until a late hour when the grand old hymn, "Nearer My God to Thee," was sung by the congregation, accompanied by the entire orchestra of seven pieces, and for once at least our old hall rang with music, the vibration of which we think will ring in every soul till at least our Fiftieth Anniversary is reached.

A STARTLING FACT.

The Progressive Thinker was the only Spiritualist paper that had the enterprise to publish Prof. Barrett's address before the National Association Convention of Spiritualists We have his address, covering three pages, and five other fine addresses and articles, one by Col, Ingersoll, grouped in one paper, and we want to send out 1,000,000 of them. It is worth ten times its weight in gold.

"THE LIGHT OF EGYPT,"

OR THE SCIENCE OF THE SOUL AND THE STARS.

Finely Illustrated With Eight Full-Page Engravings.

BY AN INITIATE IN ESOTERIC MASONRY.

It is claimed that this book is not a mere compilation, but thoroughly original.

It is believed to contain information upon the most vital points of Occultism and Theosophy that cannot be obtained elsewhere.

It claims to fully reveal the most recondite mysteries of man upon every plane of his existence, both here and hereafter, in such plain, simple language that a child can almost understand it.

The secret and Occult mysteries of Astrology are revealed and explained for the first time, it is affirmed, since the days of Egyptian Hieroglyphics.

An effort is made to show that the Science of the Soul and the Science of the Stars are the twin mysteries which comprise THE ONE GRAND SCIENCE OF LIFE.

The following are among the claims made for the work by its friends:

To the Spiritual investigator this book is indispensable.

To the medium it reveals knowledge beyond all earthly price, and will prove in real truth "a guide, philosopher and friend."

To the Occult it will supply the mystic key for which he has been so long earnestly seeking.

To the Astrologer it will become a "divine revelation of Science."

OPINIONS OF PRESS AND PEOPLE.

"A noble, philosophical and instructive work."—Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten.

"A work of remarkable ability and interest."—Dr. J. R. Buchanan.

"A remarkably concise, clear and forcibly interesting work. * * * It is more clear and intelligible than any other work on like subjects."—Mr. J. J. Morse.

"A careful reading of THE LIGHT OF EGYPT discovers the beginning of a new sect in Occultism, which will oppose the grafting on Western Occultists the subtile delusive dogmas of Karma and Re-incarnation."—New York Times.

"It is a volume likely to attract wide attention from that class of scholars interested in mystical science and occult forces. But it is written in such plain and simple style as to be within the easy comprehension * * * of any cultivated, scholarly reader."—The Chicago Daily Inter Ocean.

"However recondite his book, the author certainly presents a theory of first causes which is well fitted to challenge the thoughtful readers' attention and to excite much reflection."—Hartford Daily Times.

"Considered as an exposition of Occultism, or the philosophy of the Orient from a Western standpoint, this is a remarkable production."—The Daily Tribune (Salt Lake City).

"This work, the result of years of research and study, will undoubtedly create a profound sensation throughout the philosophic world."—The Detroit Commercial Advertiser.

"It is an Occult work but not a Theosophical one. * * * It is a book entirely new in its scope and must excite wide attention."—The Kansas City Journal.

Beautifully printed and illustrated on paper manufactured for this special purpose, with illuminated and extra heavy cloth binding.

MOST WONDERFUL BOOKS.

The Warfare of Science With Theology.

A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom. By ANDREW D. WHITE, LL. D., late President and Professor of History at Cornell University. In Two Volumes. 8vo. Cloth, Five Dollars. For Sale at This Office.

In these two large volumes are combined information that the reader could not find in the libraries of the world in fifty years. It shows the constant and determined opposition of Theology to the advancement that has been made in every branch of Science. To the Student it is indispensible. Every Free Thought Speaker should have it. It should circulate in every community. It goes into minute details, citing in all cases the authority, showing the persistency of Theology in fighting new and advanced ideas in Science.

"The magnum opus of the eminent ex-President of Cornell plants a new and notable milestone along the highway of ever-advancing human thought. The work is the masterpiece of a mind as devoid of wanton iconoclasm as of moral cowardice. It is a definite statement of where the best thinkers of the world now stand in the religio-scientific conflict. It is clear, honest, brave, and must be given a place among the great books of the year."—Chicago Tribune.

"The most valuable contribution that has yet been made to the history of the conflict between the theologians and the scientists; struggles that have alarmed timid Christians, but, as Mr. White shows, there was no occasion for alarm. The several chapters are extremely interesting, and while President White never flinches in telling the whole truth, as he thinks science has ascertained it, he is nowhere irreverent. He confronts truth, takes its hand, and follows boldly wherever truth bids him come."—Buffalo Commercial.

"The book is written almost colloquially, and so interestingly as to enchain the attention at once, and keep it enchained. Concise as a history of the universe could be made, tabulated so that instant reference to a particular bit of history, theory, or biography may be had, it will be valuable as a lexicon relating to religious controversy. It is crammed with information, sorted, sifted, winnowed, and prepared for the consumer, as reading it is of an absorbing interest, and it will probably provoke answering arguments."—Chicago Times-Herald.

"Undoubtedly the most exhaustive treatise which has been written on this subject. It is able, scholarly, critical, and impartial in tone."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"A literary event of prime importance is the appearance of 'A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom.'"—Philadelphia Press.

These two large volumes, containing about 900 pages, will be sent to any address on the receipt of the price, Five Dollars.

GOLDEN THOUGHT.

The spirit holds the same relations to the spirit-world that man sustains to the physical.

SUBJECT: THE SPIRIT-WORLD.

For the older groups: The belief in immortality and in a home for the spirit after the death of the body is of remote antiquity. Savage people think that the approved of the gods will find the plains and forests well stocked with game, and life there only an intense animal gratitification. The hell fancied by the race on the borders of the frigid zone is a frozen waste.

Heaven and hell are conditions of the mind, and exist in future life the same as here. He who is in harmony with the laws of his being is in heaven; is happy. He who antagonizes the laws of his being suffers; is unhappy; is in hell.

To come to the full light of knowledge that brings obedience to law, is to "escape the bondage of sin," and this is the end all will reach.

Yet beyond these mental conditions there is an objective reality. There is a spirit-world; rather there are spirit-worlds, or zones, real and substantial to spiritual beings.

As fragrance arises from blossoms, so the spiritual elements arise from the changes in the physical world. These elements, too ethereal to be called matter, may be designated as substance, arise and form zones around the earth, held in place by attractive force.

If objected that we cannot see these zones, it may be replied that we cannot see the air, although dense in comparison.

Of that spirit realm we can know but little. We have words to express thoughts growing out of known conditions and relations, but we know scarcely anything of this higher life, and hence there are no words to describe it. When spirits who have returned attempt to do so, or those who have been in trance, the only means is by emblems and comparisons which give distorted impressions.

While like in correspondence to the physical, the spirit-world is so different that no adequate description can be given understandable to those who have a knowledge only of the former.

For the younger groups: You all wish to be happy; that is, to go to heaven and to be in heaven.

How will you get to heaven? In the main it must be by your own efforts in doing what is right.

At death all will become spirits, but there will be the same division into the happy and unhappy as on earth.

The leaders may ask the members how they are able to make themselves most happy, and how most unhappy. It is interesting for them to relate stories of personal experience.

Make a close distinction between enjoyment from normal, pure and high sources, and from abnormal and low.

Some children enjoy cruelty, because they are cruel and half-savage. Especially should these be taught humanity.

Others indulge in coarseness, rudeness and profanity. Explain why these are to be replaced by sweetness, gentleness and kindness. Profanity is the language of passion. It indicates an ungoverned mind, and coarseness of thought.

MEMORY GEMS.

True spiritual growth garners the present for future needs.

Do thy full duty in the present life, because such is best for future welfare.

The human spirit is like a mirror, bright as a burnished mirror, to receive and hold every impression.

What clouds of mystery are hung
Around that one idea, heaven!
And though forever songs have rung
Across its bars by angels sung,
The cloud which veils it is not riven.

"Do the angels rest in heaven?
Aye, in eternal activity which is rest."

GOLDEN CHAIN RECITATION.

Con.—Well, maybe it is delusion
That the soul lives after death;
L.—But, if so, it is far the dearest
Which the tongue of mortal saith.
C.—And since so much of life's pleasure
Is wrought of unreal things
L.—I shall always hold to the riches
Which the "dear delusion" brings.
Con.—Delusions of earth are mocking
Wherever we mortals go,
And finding so much unreal,
Has cost me a deal of woe.
L.—But the dream of life immortal
Will never bring me pain;
For when it is proven error,
I shall count not loss nor gain.
Con.—I shall never live to know it,
If my darlings are only dust;
L.—And all that the weakest and wisest
Can do is to hope and trust.
Con.—I may reason and doubt, but ever
They come to speak from the sky;
L.—Then it seems but a cold delusion
To dream that a soul can die.
Con.—You may shower me with dust and ashes,
You may give me a wreath of rue,
You may dream you have truth and wisdom
And I am less brave than you;
L.—But still, I shall never yield it
For a thing you say or do;
Con.—You cannot make it error,
L.—And I cannot make it true.
Con.—We all must wait and wonder
What the change of death will bring;
L.—Your sketches are skulls and cross-bones
Which I to the winds would fling,
Con.—And picture immortal faces
Brow-girt with asphodels,
L.—And hands which are reaching earthward
Bunches of immortelles.
Con.—But neither your wise conclusions,
Nor mine, with their rainbow wings,
L.—Can alter one jot or tittle
The eternal law of things!
Con—Yet, ah! in the world that this is
It were all too sad to stay,
All.—If we could not have our fancies
Of "The ever-so-far-away."

meaning. But that which makes the world pulsate with greater joy to-day and fills human hearts with higher and holier knowledge concerning this is, that one step more has been taken toward this greater knowledge; one added and overwhelming power has been felt in the world leading to this more perfect light, and that is in the great spiritual impetus of this latter portion of the nineteenth century, and when the twentieth century fully dawns, not because it is the twentieth century of human computation, but because thus much more of knowledge is added to human life, and when it presses forward to still more rapid culmination, more and more will this dispensation be revealed unto you.

But let us tell you now, as we have told you again and again, nothing of this comes by first establishing the external and then bringing the spirit up to its height. It must grow as grows the flowers from within; as grow those bursting buds that now are making ready for summer time and for fruitage; as grow all things in the visible worlds around you. So this dispensation cometh. Such time as all are ready for this unfoldment from within, casting aside selfishness and human pride and human hatred, when you shall have learned their valuelessness; and not until then.

Talk until doomsday about unselfishness and still you have not outgrown selfishness; talk forever about human brotherhood, if the human brotherhood is not within you will not accomplish it thus; but by that growth that comes from the real victory, that is the cause of the real conquest. Then, lo! in all the border lands that human life hath entered, and the impinging realms of spirits and angels that keep watch, announce and declare, there will be the consciousness. Earth is ready now and the new light doth appear.

WONDERS OF PSYCHIC

And Medical Healing.

PSYCHIC POWER IN CONNECTION WITH A THOROUGH KNOWLEDGE OF MEDICINE IS THE GRANDEST COMBINATION FOR RELIEVING HUMAN SUFFERING.

It is easy to relieve some pains; it is easy to cure some diseases, and there is no physician who has practiced medicine long who cannot produce some testimonials of his skill. Even the most ignorant blunder onto a fair prescription, but for universal success we have few peers and we acknowledge no superiors in our line of work.

Dr. Burroughs graduated March 25, 1897, in the American Medical College, Allopathic or regular, and stood one of the first in his class, though having a large and constantly increasing practice to attend to during the winter months. This is his third medical diploma. We could fill volumes with letters like the following. All are genuine and every case was a difficult one.

Evans City, Pa., Jan 20, 1897.

I have a very bad case of chronic catarrh. My lungs are very bad and sore. I perspire so very greatly at night and when I get out of bed the air chills me to the heart. I cough night and day and am so short of breath that I cannot do any work at all. I spit fully a pint of phlegm every two hours. I am getting so poor that my clothes will not stay on me. And, oh, I am so very weak. I am discouraged. MRS. ANNIE DANCE.

Evans City, Pa., Feb. 15, 1897.

My Dear Doctors:—I would say that I am surely on the road to health. I am so much better. I fervently say: "God bless the dear doctors who have saved me from the brink of the grave."

MRS. ANNIE DANCE.

Evans City, Pa., Mar. 19, 1897.

My Dear Doctors:—I am still improving. My friends say: "Oh, Mrs. Dance, you look so well." I have no more night sweats. I sleep soundly. My nerves are much better, my appetite is good and foods digest. I am doing my own work and my own washing. You can cure any curable case. All who are ill should write you.

MRS. ANNIE DANCE.

Malden, Mass., Mar. 24, 1897.

I feel that I do not need further treatment. I feel better than I have for the last five years. My four months' treatment with you has done wonders for me. I have had great faith in your treatment ever since I began taking it. I cannot fully express my thanks to you. I am perfectly willing you should use my testimony if it would induce those of my sex who are suffering to apply to you for relief.

MRS. EMMA F. FOWLER.

Crystal Lake, Ill., Mar. 1, 1897.

Dear Doctors:—Your magnetized paper did me great good. My stomach has felt better since using it and I have felt better in every way.

MRS. SARAH MARLOW.

Wakelee, Mich., Feb. 28, 1897.

My Dear Doctors:—I received the medicine the 25th. I am gaining steadily. The psychic treatment is doing wonders for me. SARAH E. GOFF.

Candia, N. H., Feb. 14, 1897.

I think the medicine has done wonders for me. I have many times been sensitive of spirit help during the sittings. One night I was reading and forgot the time and my chair began to rock very decidedly. E. J. JELLISON.

Mrs. Byers' little child has always been delicate and has been treated by all the best local physicians with not much benefit. After one month's treatment she writes:

510 Wabash Ave., Kansas City, Mo.

Marion is doing well. Is heartier than she has ever been.

MRS. A. W. BYERS.

S. Deerfield, Mass., Jan. 27, 1897.

When sitting for psychic treatment I put my hand upon your signature, and I feel the electricity strong.

MINNIE W. WHITE.

Thorntonville, Ga., Jan. 27, 1897.

Dear Doctors:—Your letter came to hand on the 20th inst. When I received it my jaw was hurting very bad and I held the letter in my hand and it got easy and I went to sleep. I rested good and slept better that night than I have for a long time.

MRS, AGNES C. WALL.

Laconia, N. H., Feb. 22, 1897.

Dear Doctors:—To-day I had a severe pain in my left lung and I put on the piece of brown paper with your signature on it and was relieved of it very soon. ELIZA SWASEY.

St. Louis, June 21, 1896.

MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.

With affectionate regards, very truly,

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.

VOL. 15. CHICAGO, ILL., SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1897, NO. 387

BY ITS FRUIT, JUDGE IT.

FRUITS OF "CHRISTIAN" SPIRITUALISM—IT LEADS TO OBSESSIONS AND SENDS VICTIMS TO THE INSANE ASYLUM—OBJECT LESSONS FURNISHED BY THOSE WHO DO NOT READ CURRENT SPIRITUAL LITERATURE.

The statement recently made by The Progressive Thinker, that not more than one Spiritualist in 300 subscribed for a Spiritualist paper, is not far from the mark, and in that statement lies the secret cause of all the inharmony in our ranks.

Most people, when they learn that spirit communion is a reality, read one or two copies of a Spiritualist paper, or perhaps a book, form their opinions and there they stick, an obstruction in the pathway of evolution, instead of reading all the obtainable evidence from the spirit world, weighing, considering it and advancing with the age. The truths of to-day may prove errors to-morrow. New revelations are being continually made, and there is no theory upon which we can rest either in this life or the life to be. B. F. Underwood sounded the key note when he said: "We must agree to disagree." This only will bring harmony.

Others, upon proof of spirit return, rush back to their old book of butchery, with its doctrine of devils, hell fire and damnation, which sometimes leads them into religious fanaticism, like the following case, clipped from the press dispatches in a San Francisco daily:

Los Angeles, Cal., March 28.—The trial of the libel suit of Miss Josephine Holmes, head and founder of the queer sect known as the Belmont Hall Society, against a local newspaper has been the means of letting in a flood of light upon the unique professions of these people and many of their queer antics at the hall. It was disclosed in the testimony taken yesterday that at least one deluded woman had passed from the hall to the insane asylum at Highlands. The witness who supplied the merriment of the day, as well as the sensations, was Mrs. Van Auken, a former member of the society. Mrs. Van Auken, referring to Miss Holmes, said:

"I was very susceptible. She began her teachings and I went her way. She led; I followed. I firmly believed her when she told me that she was the greatest medium of modern times; that she was on earth to complete the work that Christ left unfinished. She commanded me to discard my ideas of Spiritualism. I did. She ordered me to obey her implicitly. I did so. She was at my house from May until August and was nearly always under control of some unseen spiritualistic power.

"Some times she would hammer the devils out of her power with her fists. I vividly recall my own experience in this particular. She pounced upon me and pounded me hard, not being particular where the blows landed.

"Oh, I believed in all that nonsense then, but I don't now. Why, I once saw Miss Holmes make a fistic attack upon John Griddel, a roomer at the house, and thump him until she thought all the devils of which he was infested had taken flight."

The witness vividly described how the medium had once found herself under the control of a snake. She threw herself upon the floor, but upon her back, contrary to the habit of snakes. She squirmed and crawed about the room for awhile and then darted under a couch upon which was stretched a fellow-medium, Miss Lundgren. The latter was possessed of a wild beast, and between snake and beast the witness was frightened within an inch of her life.

Finally the pair escaped from the control of the snake and beast spirits and explained themselves. Their real spirits, they told Mrs. Van Auken, had been off on an excursion to Africa and way points, leaving their uninhabited bodies behind. On their returning they found their recently vacated physical systems in possession of claim-jumpers sent by the Devil for their vexation, and had a hard tussle to oust them.

The above is evidently one of the results of "Christian" Spiritualism, which opens the door for obsession; but here is another:

The First Christian Spiritual Society of Oakland publishes a little folder with its program and creed, which it distributes every Sunday in its meetings. From the creed we select the following astonishing sentence:

"The aim of this Society is to bring men to Christ, to truth, by actual knowledge of that truth which the Holy Bible teaches."

And yet the secretary of this society has sprung a monthly magazine upon the public under the name of Spiritualism, entitled "Rays of Light" and very feeble rays they are. Some of the stories would better suit an orthodox Sunday-school journal than a Spiritualist magazine.

When all Spiritualists learn to take as many live progressive Spiritualist papers as they can afford; when they learn that no one spirit knows it all and that no medium, book or paper gives all there is to learn of the philosophy of life here and hereafter, then will order come out of chaos, harmony prevail and we will make a showing of our strength in the land that will command as much respect as any religious body in existence.

If these deluded "Christian" Spiritualists would read Professor Joseph Rodes Buchanan's new book on "Primitive Christianity," they would learn that that the Christianity of today is simply ancient Paganism, which was labelled "Christianity" about the first century, when true Christianity (Spiritualism) was crushed.

A NEW CHRISTIANITY.

COMING IN WITH THE NEW CENTURY, SAYS REV. COPELAND—NEW CREED TO TEACH MAN A CHILD OF GOD, INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY AND CONTINUED INSPIRATION.

In glancing over our exchanges it is a delight to notice the advances towards truth which are shown in the American pulpit. Here is the report of a discourse in Salem, Oregon, a few days ago, which indicates that good, practical common sense is occasionally heard on the Pacific coast. It does not matter to what sect Rev. W. E. Copeland belongs. It is not sermons of that stamp which make men worse whenever they are listened to. His text was "The New Religion of the New Century." The Oregonian reports him in part:

"We have had nearly 2,000 years of Christianity, and the world is yet sunk in ignorance and selfishness, regardless of divine law. Christian civilization is a thin veneer over heathen barbarism, and lacks many of the virtues found among the heathen. Surely we need a new religion, and the Father of all is ever ready to supply his children's needs. Nor are there signs wanting, that with the new century we shall have a new religion. It may have no name; it may still be called Christianity; but it will be altogether unlike the Christianity, so popular to-day. On all sides we find a revolt from the creeds of the past, and the heathen practices of the present. There is a multiplication of heretical bodies of unbelievers, called by many names, differing on many points, but all united in cutting away from the popular church, which retains its popularity by catering to a love for sensation and by making the terms of admission easier.

This new religion is really new only to those Christians who persist in repeating the old man-made creeds, and believing the medieval superstitions. It is the same as the universal religion of which Buddhism, Islamism and Christianity are particular forms, the same as that universal religion which underlies all the simple Christianity taught by Jesus and his apostles.

"The first article in the new creed, which has been accepted by the leaders in all the race religions, is man, a child of God, which Jesus plainly teaches in the parable of the prodigal son. This idea, once common among all Christians, during the Dark Ages, dropped out of the creed of Christendom, to the great injury of Christians. Many outside the popular churches are insisting that human nature is divine; that there burns in every man a flame lighted from the eternal spiritual sun; in short, that man is at the heart one with God; the essential and permanent part of man is spirit, is God.

"The second article is that of individual responsibility. This is brought to the front by all students of the Oriental philosophies, of whom there is an ever-increasing number. The trouble with Christianity to-day, which prevents it from sweetening politics, from purifying society, and from ennobling business, is its denial of the doctrine of individual responsibility. Nothing so much increases vice and weakens virtue as the popular idea that all the bad man has to do is to confess his belief in the redeeming power of the blood of Jesus. As originally taught by Paul, this doctrine was most salutary, referring as it did, to the blood shed by each individual as he offered himself as a sacrifice, at one time to God. This doctrine of atonement is most valuable, and when restored to its original position, shall work wonders in reducing the evil committed by men. When once it is firmly fixed in the mind of each man, woman and child, that they are responsible, and that the consequences of a wrong deed cannot be escaped, there will surely be a great change in political and social life. Suppose every man elected to the Oregon Legislature had been firmly convinced that he was individually responsible for any wrong done, which could not be dodged by any loyalty to party or to church, do you suppose we should have had the farcical drama which was played at the statehouse?

"The third article is the brotherhood in Christ, and is fully as important as any of the others. Not once in Jesus was the Christ made flesh, but in each human being, who was born into the world. The new religion has its plan of salvation—natural, however, and not artificial—a plan which is worked within each human heart; there is the birth, the growth, the suffering, the death, the resurrection and ascension not of one man Jesus, but of all men. In all dwells the Christ, the hope of glory. And from this is deduced the most important doctrine of all—the brotherhood in Christ, the divine fraternity which worked such wonders in the early church and whenever triumphant has worked equally great wonders in every religion and among every people. All men are brothers, because in all men dwells the divine. We have indeed a new heaven and a new earth; indeed, the new heaven on the new earth.

"The fourth article in the creed of the new religion is continued inspiration—new words of God for new times and new emergencies. Not the Jewish Bible only, but the American; not prophets in Judea only, but prophets in the United States. It naturally follows if all men are sons of God, that the Father will ever speak to his children. No possible reason can be offered on any theory of religion to prove that the Jewish Bible is the only word of God. That it needs a supplement, all churches which employ ministers admit. If it is all-sufficient and the only word of God, what is the use of the minister? What are his sermons for? Does not the fact that all Christian churches employ ministers prove that the Bible is not a complete revelation? If it were, then we should need none to teach what it means; but every church employs a teacher, whose duty it is to explain what the revelation reveals—rather a peculiar kind of revelation, to say the least.

"The last article in the creed of the new religion is progress through suffer-

ANGELL PRIZE CONTEST.

A GOOD WORK IN CLEVELAND, OHIO.

The oratorical contest by the Band of Mercy of the Progressive Lyceum was a notable event and a great success. It was held in Army and Navy Hall, one of the finest in the city, and the entire program promised was presented without a missing number.

The exercises opened with violin and piano; a selection from "Il Trovatore," by Mr. N. S. Barsby and Mrs. Sylvia M. Van Wormer, which proved a beautiful prelude to the contest, after which Mr. Thomas Lees stated the object of the meeting. Mr. Lees was chairman of the committee of arrangements, and consequently all felt assurance that nothing would be forgotten which would contribute to the completeness of the affair. He spoke as follows:

Friends, within our Children's Progressive Lyceum, or Spiritual Sunday-School, we have a society called "The Lyceum Band of Mercy." It is one of more than 27,000 scattered over the world, and the first one was organized in Boston, Mass., by Geo. T. Angell, only fifteen years ago. Its object is to promote humane education among the young folks. The pledge each member takes is one all can take with a clear conscience, namely, "I will be kind to all harmless living creatures, and try to protect them from cruel usage."

To further this humane object, the plan of these prize oratorical contests was formulated by Emma Rood Tuttle and presented to the National Humane Association at its Annual Convention last fall in this city, and was unanimously adopted. It has since received the official endorsement of the Master of the National Grange, of the National Superintendent of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and of many teachers and lyceum conductors in this and other countries.

Many of these contests have already taken place with pronounced success, but none so far in Cleveland. The Children's Progressive Lyceum has the honor of holding the first Angell Contest in this city, and the double honor of having a real, live, wide-awake Mayor to preside—The Hon. Robert E. McKisson.

The selections to be rendered this evening are all from one book entitled "Angell Prize-Contest Recitations," compiled by Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle, of Berlin Heights, Ohio, the author of many of the pieces contained therein. All teach sympathy, mercy and justice to all living creatures.

The prize to be won by the contestants to-night is a

issued by the American Humane Education Society, whose wish it is to have similar contests to this take place in every Sunday-School, and Lyceum in the country, so that later, the winners of these silver medals may come in friendly competition for gold ones.

The plan seems to me a good one, and is certainly well adapted to the furtherance of humane work. I know of no better way to secure the end desired than to commence with the little ones, our children.

Mayor McKisson not having yet arrived, Mr. Lees, on concluding his remarks requested Mr. E. C. Parmelee, treasurer of the American Humane Association; and general agent for the Cleveland Humane Society, to preside until he did.

Mr. Parmelee on taking the chair was greeted with a hearty round of applause, and made some very touching remarks on Humane Education for Our Children.

ON WITH THE CONTEST.

In order to determine the contestants' order of speaking, numbers from one to ten, were written on cardboard and dropped in a hat by Mr. Parmelee, and after being well shaken up by him each scholar came forward from seats in front of the stage, and drew the number which determined his or her turn to recite, resulting as follows:

1. Vivian Davis .... Sweet Revenge.
2. Alice Englcart .. How Christmas Came to the Poor House.
3. Rose Russell ..... The Nabob's Double.
4. Arthur Davies ..... Sympathy.
5. Ruby Snape .... My Horse Mary. (A story of Vivisection.)
6. Danny Cook ... Catching the Colt.
7. Marie Bellows .. The Beer Shop. (A Washerwoman's Story.)
8. Ella Pfleyer ..... Tom.
9. Virgil Bellows .. Retributive Treatment of Criminals.
10. Hattie McDonald .. Catching the Colt.

(By an oversight numbers 6 and 10 had the same selection.) The contestants were known to the three judges by numbers only. Judge J. E. Blandin, W. S. Kermish and Mrs. G. A. Robertson were the judges and awarding committee.

The Mayor on entering was heartily applauded, and after taking his seat on the stage, when five of the speakers had spoken, His Honor Mayor McKisson was introduced, making a brief address commending humane education among the young and also commending the Progressive Lyceum, and its Band of Mercy, for their enterprise in giving the first contest in Cleveland.

A brilliant piano selection was rendered by Miss Geneva Richards, Musical Director of the Lyceum, and the young orators proceeded.

The last recitation being finished, the awarding committee, who had occupied seats apart, in the body of the hall, retired to the ante-room, and compared their markings on the following points of merit: Voice, Articulation, Gestures, Memory, and General Effect. During their deliberations, above the piano music could be heard the exciting discussion among the audience, relative to the respective merits of the speakers. At last the judges came to the stage, Judge Blandin acting as mouthpiece. After speaking of the difficulty of deciding among so many good speakers, which was really the best, he announced No. 6—Master Danny Cook, the winner of the medal.

A second prize had been offered and HIGHER SPIRITUALISM.

THE ROSTRUM AND THE SEANCE—THE PHILOSOPHY AND PHENOMENA—S. M. SEELEY'S MUSEUM OF SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA.

Spiritualism, to me, is a many-sided issue, or religion, whichsoever it may be termed; but be it called a science, a philosophy or a religion, it has for its foundation phenomena, or it has no foundation more solid than any other ism or osophy of the past. Is there anything higher than truth and love? Is there anything lower than falsehood, deception, hate and revenge? Justice is an attribute of love and truth. Hence if there are truth and love in the teachings of Spiritualism are they not in the foundation—the phenomena—as well as in the philosophy? If they are, is there any higher Spiritualism?

To me the tiny rap, rap, rap that comes upon the bed as I close my eyes in slumber; that vision that flashes before my closed or wide-open eyes, of my mother, my father, my sister, my brother or my loved one, mortal or immortal; that touch upon the arm, upon the head, the face, or other part of the body, is as sacred and divine, as sublime, as high as any thought that can come to my sensitive brain; just as high and grand to my soul as the most eloquent oratory given to man. Is it not to you, kind reader? When you can get a communication from a loved one who has often written you in the form, is it not even a greater pleasure now than then? To know that the form you laid back to its native substance was but the home—the earth home of the soul that continues its love and tenderness, its communications and sweet counsel? Is it not a beautiful, a high, a sublime thought? If there is no proof, there is no hope; if there is no hope, there is naught in this nor any other life.

Most assuredly Spiritualism is making rapid strides, and the most glaring proof of this is the fact that its enemies, those whose theories are most suffering on account of its advent, are trying by legislation and every other conceivable method to stamp it out; but in what way is it appealing to the minds of the masses with the most telling effect? The question is answered by the advocates of a "Higher Spiritualism." They say that the most noted lecturer and the most noted medium in the country placed in two separate halls in the same city would give the medium a crowded house and the lecturer no more than a "Corporal's guard."

The fact is, the people have listened and listened for ages, and now they must see and know; and if they cannot know, there is no longer anything but a hole in the ground after the short and useless race of earth-life is lived. "No hope beyond," as the song runs, and as it ever will run if the world through Spiritualism can get no response from those who have passed away.

America is a great nation and the earth is a great sphere, but America is not the only nation on the earth, and the earth is but a mere speck in the great universe of matter; and Spiritualism with its broadness of the infiniverse contains its many sides, its many phases, its many osophies and isms, but without the demonstration to our outer senses we have but little proof palpable of its philosophy—so-called.

We are apt to shut our eyes and shake our heads in egotistic wisdom, hold high in air our disgusted nasal prefixes at the mere mention of the name of one who is most eager after truth and sincere and honest in his search for it, because we think he is being swindled, being "played upon as a mark," and say he is a "phenomena-hunter," "a Spiritist." Is this always true? Are they always swindled or only swindled according to "our judgment, our measurement?" If a man gets value received according to his own judgment and is satisfied, why need others interfere with his satisfaction and consequent complacency of mind, by giving him their measurement of his acquisitions?

One of the best known Spiritualists to-day is none other than Sol M. Seeley, of Sterling, Ill.; he came by his knowledge through the phenomena, wholly, and thinks as much of it now as when he got the first manifestation, and probably more, because of his present lack of skepticism, his perfect sincerity and lack of suspicion and while here at his home your correspondent will just run over and take an inventory or record of his curiosity shop, his spiritual laboratory or museum of Spiritual phenomena and give it farther on in this article) In many instances he might have been the easy victim of some charlatans, in the estimation of others, but he knows it not, he sees it not; to him they are genuine and in that thought he is supremely happy. He takes no one into his home to perform a "Punch and Judy show for curiosity-seekers," but to him he takes the true mediums, and he enjoys making Spiritualists by and through the clinching tests. Whatever may be said of Sol M. Seeley, he is sincere and without an unfounded suspicion, but takes what, to him, is great precaution against deception, for the sake of the investigator and because the truth to him is as sacred as to any other person on earth, and a fraud in so sacred a thing as the reappearance of his spirit friends would almost break his heart and he would stamp it down as readily as anyone, but his aptitude in perceiving fraud may probably not be as acute as many others, yet that is not at all against his honor.

Now the collation of these precious relics and sweet mementoes: His first slate-writing test was in 1877, through Witherford, long since suicided, and well known in spiritual ranks. The writing was from his daughter. Then came his wonderful experiences with and through E. A. Wilson. His first materialization was through Bastian and Taylor in S. S. Jones' office in the Religio building in 1873, since which he has witnessed this phase of manifestation through about twenty different mediums, including over five hundred seances in all and physical manifestations innumerable. He has had not less

"END OF THE WORLD."

THE SECOND COMING OF THE CHRIST

To the Editor:—I have heard and read of this event since I was a child, but never heard any thing that could make me believe that it would be as soon as was said. A second coming of the Christ was always connected with it, and that puzzled me.

When Spiritualism developed I thought it might have some relation to the prophecies. Then it dawned on my mind that the end of the world meant the end of an epoch. Some years later I heard Dr. Thomas say that we were nearing the end of this epoch and the beginning of the next. That strengthened my intuitive impression.

The Chicago Tribune lies before me containing a synopsis of a new book, "The New Era at Hand," by Prof. Bimbleby, an astronomer in London, in which he announces the near approach of the last prophetic period when Christ is to come and the Millennium to begin. This is no prediction, but the result of calculation according to prophetic and historical data.

Prof. Bimbleby says: "Bible time is the only perfect time and agrees to a second with the time produced by the magnificent clockwork of the heavens," which he calls A. M., or astronomical time. He further says that sixteen of the seventeen prophecies were fulfilled at the exact time predicted and therefore he is fully convinced that this last one will be fulfilled on time.

GREAT EVENTS ARE PREDICTED.

The author, by diagrams and tables, placing prophecies and calculations in parallel columns, comes to the following conclusions:

First—The Turkish Empire will be overthrown in September, 1897.

Second—Gentile times will cease in the spring of 1898.

Third—The Jews will be restored on the same date.

Fourth—Christ will reappear on earth on Easter day.

Fifth—The resurrection and judgment will take place on or about the same time.

Sixth—The winding up of earthly affairs will continue for thirty years, or until 1928.

Seventh—The millennium will begin in the year 1928.

By nine separate and distinct methods, using prophecy, history, and figures, he reaches identically the same inevitable conclusion—that from 1898 to 1928 will witness the culmination and fulfillment of the last great predictions in the Bible. The fact that nine independent lines of calculation end in the same manner is in itself significant.

Prof. Bimbleby, I think, very wisely avoids the error of the clergy by stating the facts without any theological explanation.

I never falter in my opinion that Spiritualism is a positive element in this eventful period; and I am exceedingly sorry that Spiritualists show so much prejudice against the Bible as the book of religion of the epoch nearing its close; and think that they above all others should take deep interest in this subject and be prepared to do their part intelligently in this the greatest event the world has ever witnessed since the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy.

This is not the end or destruction of the world according to Bimbleby, but an entire change in the present state of things in which old things shall pass away and all things shall become new.

The prophet Daniel, speaking of it, says: "None but the wise shall understand." The prophets did not always understand their own prophecies, but had to study them as our prophets—mediums—have to do to-day. The Jews knew the tribe of which their Messiah—Christ—was to come, and the time, but they had not grown spiritual enough to allow their ceremonial worship to be superseded by the pure spiritual precepts of the Christ. Hence their dispersion and only now to be restored. Spiritualism is the John the Baptist of the Millennial dispensation though many are unconscious of it; and will they not be wise and understand the coming grand, unselfish religion that will supersede all present forms and bind them together in one universal brotherhood and sisterhood, when the dove of peace shall rest on each one and "there shall be none to hurt or destroy."

R. NEELY.

GIVES THEM AWAY.

The Methodist Episcopal church has awakened a tartar at Scranton, Pa., in the person of the Rev. J. C. Hogan, who for the last two years has refused to take his appointment in the Wyoming conference, of which he was a member, claiming that he was being discriminated against, because he was a prohibitionist, and who withdrew therefrom recently, addressed a big crowd at the Metropolitan theater. His first criticism was that the conference failed to make public his reasons for withdrawing, intimating that they were afraid to do so. He then proceeded to read his reasons. Among other things he said:

"The position and reputation of a faithful preacher of salvation and righteousness cannot be safe in the keeping of willfully sinful and partisan bishops and presiding elders."

He alleged that the church was in complicity with the liquor traffic, and that the vast majority of the bishops, pastors and voting members of the Methodist Episcopal church cast their influence and ballots for the representatives of the liquor traffic, showing that they were hirelings, and not sheperds.

It is to be supposed that when a Methodist minister makes an assertion like that which the Rev. Hogan has made in the above, it is true, and if not the conference has its recourse in law. It is a pretty hard thing to say that the M. E. church is "in complicity with the liquor traffic," and that "the bishops, pastors and voting members are hirelings, and not sheperds," when that institution poses before the camera of public criticism as moral, religious, refined, pure and prohibitionists to the core.

"TEMPUS FUGIT."

CHURCH OF THE SOUL—WOMAN'S WORK—THE MARGARET FULLER CLUB.

To the Editor:—"Tempus Fugit"—Yes, and it flies so quickly that were it not that the symptoms of spring are upon us, and that in every budding leaf, and bursting blossom, we hear the voice of that which will speedily summon us to the enjoyments of the summer vacation, we could hardly realize that we have progressed so far in the seasons work.

When I last reported it was to tell of the change of service from the morning to the evening, with the consequent removal to the Masonic Temple, where the crowded hall, sometimes to overflowing, is the best possible proof that the exchange was one in the right direction. The subjects of the season's discourses have been of unusual interest, especially those of the past few weeks, when in response to the expressed wish of many of our people, the guides have been giving a series upon that which is of course the fundamental principle of the church: "The Soul in Human Embodiments," and the interest that is felt in this subject is shown by the increased audience whenever this subject is announced. This proving beyond a doubt, that these teachings are surely finding a responsive echo in the hearts of those (and they are many) ready to receive them.

Our beloved pastor, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, has been indefatigable in the work, responding to every outside demand when it was possible to comply, flitting away between Sundays to attend the Board meetings of the National Association at Washington—and also to attend conventions at Buffalo, and other places, to say nothing of weddings and funerals, and yet, thus far has been in her own place ministering to her own people every Sunday through the season.

The new regime of the Band of Harmony has been an unqualified success. Our friends have generously thrown their homes open and the capacity of the largest houses have been severely taxed, and whilst as a matter of course the social feature has been a very prominent one, the spiritual exercises have been so marked, that they have called forth the admiration and delight of the large audiences that are always present. The afternoon sessions have been devoted to Woman's Work, and the hour has been spent with some one of the noble women who have been transplanted to the fairer gardens of spirit life.

Thursday, April 1st, was a red letter day, the Inspirer being that devoted friend to her own sex, as well as to humanity—Margaret Fuller, who became somewhat later in life, Marchioness Ossili. It will be remembered that this wonderful woman was one of that brilliant group of minds including as it did, Emerson, Hawthorne, Channing, Alcott, and others whose very names have helped to immortalize and almost make sacred the little town of Concord. It was the privilege of the Band of Harmony to entertain as their guests for the afternoon, the members of the Margaret Fuller Club with their president and founder, Mrs. Lucinda B. Chandler, who in response to an invitation from Mrs. Richmond, in the name of the club paid a graceful and loving tribute to the memory of her whose name they bear and whose noble principles are the foundation stones of the club to which they belong. Others followed along the same line of eulogizing the life and work of this noble woman, and all were evidently ardent admirers of the lofty principles advocated by her, and which were beautifully and eloquently set forth in the address which she gave through the lips of Mrs. Richmond. As she gave out those wonderfully beautiful thoughts which seemed to dove-tail so well into the spirit of the times, it was hard to realize that those same views expressed when in the earthly form, had caused her to be regarded as a peculiar woman, often isolating her from the sympathy and support of the class for whom she so earnestly and constantly labored.

This was but one of the many precious treats we have had, as one and another of these noble minds have addressed us through the same inspired lips, and one striking feature has been the perfect individuality expressed by each, sometimes giving the little peculiarities of speech and manner so perfectly that it has called forth expression of amazement from those who were privileged to know them during their earthly pilgrimage.

We shall continue these delightful meetings until the close of the season.

BRAHMINISM.

An answer to Ernest S. Green, and his Spiritualized revision of the poem entitled "Faith in the Great Over-Soul," by a Brahmin.

Man's soul comes from the Ocean of life,
And dwells awhile amid the earth scenes of strife;
And in the ages to come, in the eons before,
His soul returns to earth scenes no more,
But like the dewdrop on rose leaf at morn
Returns to the fountain from whence it was born;
Ashes to ashes, and dust unto clay
Holds good with our bodies of earthly decay.
So man's soul in the eons and ages beyond,
To the fount of all life in joy will respond;
There lost in the "Over-Soul," no more to be known
On earth or elsewhere as an individualized one,
There forever and ever he will peacefully dwell
No trouble, no toil, no heaven nor hell,
But rest for the weary in the bosom of life
A purified soul beyond temptation and strife.

NOT ALL IS GOLD.

INDEPENDENT SLATE-WRITING SOMETIMES DECEPTIVE.

To the Editor:—One of your many able contributors, not long since sounded a very necessary note of warning to all who feel inclined to "try the spirits," in their efforts to gain the knowledge that "if a man die" does he still live; his reference being to some of the dangers from imposture, and uncertainties attending that which is received through the independent slate-writer.

The inclination is frequently strong to accept as entirely reliable and true whatever has been received through that channel when the test conditions are such as to make it certain that the writing is produced entirely by spirit agency, and the name, or part of the name of some near, dear, and well known truthful spirit friend is given as the writer. In this inclination is hidden a serious danger of being deceived. For some strange, and not fully known reason, when even the genuineness of the mediumship cannot be reasonably questioned, some of these writings prove entirely untrustworthy. They will very likely contain most flattering predictions of bright and promising coming events in life, and that you are—without knowing it—so naturally mediumistic yourself, that with the aid of the developing power of the medium and his guides you will become in a little time a medium also for like slate-writing, and various other phases of the phenomena; and your dearly loved spirit friend urges you to arrange the terms with the medium, and take some sittings for development.

Who could hesitate to thus gratify the expressed wish of their dearest spirit friend? So a round sum of the "needful" is soon produced, (though urgently needed for use in other directions) and the neccessary "terms" are then soon arranged. After a prolonged season of disappointment will come the inevitable awakening to learn that "grave-yard dirt" is not the only deceptive method employed to humbug over-confiding mortals, and that all the flattering assurances they have been receiving from "Guide John Gray," are but a snare to entrap them.

Such is a true history of frequent happenings upon this Coast, and these lines are given simply to warn investigators of some of the dangers to be encountered, and that as your contributor referred to also truly stated; not all communications received through independent slate-writing by undoubted spirit agency, are reliable, but must be received and weighed with the same caution as through other channels of communication. For we seem to have entered upon times when much that is presented as spirit phenomena is totally unreliable, and is evidently given to aid some one to pocket the coin of the over-confiding investigator, and that, too, regardless of the generally considered sacred character of the subject.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

DOES NOT LIKE SUPERSTITIOUS MUMMERIES, ETC.

To the Editor:—For many months there have been various opinions expressed in The Progressive Thinker in regard to the attitude of Spiritualists toward the superstitious mummery of the church. I look on those invocations, baptisms, ordinations, using the appellation Rev. as a prefix to a spiritual lecturer, as being more detrimental to our cause than anything coming from the enemy. Those who are catering to the church for the sake of popularity, need a little experience of persecution such as many of us Spiritualists have had; but even without this experience, is it not plain to see from all past and present history that the church has in all ages persecuted even to the death many of our true mediums. At the present time I am in a newspaper discussion with a Christian, who cites me to the case of the Lord slaying Saul for inquiring of the medium at Endor, to prove that Spiritualism is a dangerous doctrine. Is it not evident to any observing mind that all those who justify the murder of Saul by the Lord, would, had they the power, do the same to-day? Knowing this, how can any true, intelligent Spiritualist wish to mimic Christianity?

However, I see some who, I admit, are intelligent, doing that very thing to the deterimentof progress in the true principles of Spiritualism. I for one left the church for the reason I was convinced that its teachings and also much in the Bible were opposed to liberty and development of the mental faculties and that churchmembers as a rule were no better than those outside; but it was after I stepped out that I learned of the tyrannical, persecuting element of a large portion of Christians. Then to think I should ever again affiliate with a class that claims to be spiritualistic and is doing much to christianize the same—no, never. I am not alone. While I am sorry to see this state of affairs, I feel will still have a noble band of brothers and sisters, among whom Dr. Conger, Mrs. Severance, Will C. Hodge, Dean Clark, Clara Watson, Dr. T. Wilkins and a host of others who will never submit to be caught in the toils of a priesthood, either Catholic or Protestant, whose chief aim is to enslave all these who worship at their shrines. The Christian church, whose record is full of rapine and murders of millions of the most brave humanitarians that have lived in past ages, who were the true saviors of humanity. Language fails me to express my contempt for the inhumanity to man which has caused millions to mourn, perpetrated by Christians.

I see another subject under discussion among Spiritualists. Some seem to almost ignore the phenomena in connection with platform work. To my thinking, more good can be done to have a good medium for the different phases of manifestations accompany every lecturer. The majority of people can-

Keeping Track of the Great Traveler.

HIS TRAVELS IN FAR OFF INDIA—ITS INTERESTING MAGIC AND OTHER FEATURES COMPARED WITH MODERN SPIRITUALISM—HIS LECTURE AS REPORTED IN THE HARBINGER OF LIGHT, AT MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA, FEB. 14th—HE WAS GREETED WITH AN IMMENSE AUDIENCE.

The Apostle Paul said, "Reprove, Rebuke, and Exhort." I am a great admirer of Paul when he and I agree. The point I wish to make is this: I especially requested the Committee to select tunes which the whole congregation could sing. Hereafter, perhaps, the Committee will be obedient to the previous request. I enjoy a chorus sung by the entire audience. It is harmonizing and uplifting.

The subject for the evening is "Travels in India," etc., some of the marvels I saw and the lessons gathered therefrom with regard to spiritual manifestation and some of my own personal experiences.

Away back in the abysmal past there lived up in the Highlands of the Central portion of Asia a race of men who were shepherds, and afterwards became Farmers and Traders. They were called Aryans. One branch moved to the Southern portion of Asia, and another migrated and moved Westward. They were called Hindoo Europeans, afterwards Greeks, Romans, Scandinavians, Anglo-Saxons, and at length Englishmen. Others still moved Southward, crossed the mountains, crossed the Indus, and located lower in India. These, too, were called Hindoos, and so the ancient Hindoos and Englishmen are brothers. They are not Semitics, they are not Turanitans, they are simply brothers from one common stock, and the higher you go into the Northern portion of India, the skin of the natives becomes whiter, whiter even than the Italians. But no matter about the color of their skin, the Hindoo is naturally a thinker and reasoner. He excels in metaphysics, mathematics, and the higher sciences.

It was on July 24th, sailing up the Hoogly river, sluggish and lazy, that I was landed at Calcutta, a city of over 500,000 people. This was a marvelous country, a land of ancient tree worship, of ling worship; and a land of the old Vedas, or, as Max Muller informs us, the land of the great poems of the ages. The land of the ancient sciences, and a land to-day of moral scientists and metaphysical thinkers. India contains one and a half million of square miles, 60,000,000 Brahmins, 40,000,000 of Mohammedans, 5,000,000 of Jains and a great variety of other sects, numbering some two or three hundred millions of human beings.

Our genial American Consul in Calcutta said to me one day "Doctor, would you like to see some Hindoo Temples, and see how they worship there?" "Most assuredly I would" was the reply. All their Temples are unique and Oriental. I went to the Kali Temple with him, very old stone building in the suburbs of Calcutta, which contains a horrible stone Goddess, around whose neck was a symbol of human skulls, symbols of human corpses and a most hideous face. Here these Hindoos often slay goats and kids, the blood from which is nearly shoe deep, and I saw them stoop down and sprinkle this blood on their faces and then they beat them against the grim Goddess, where I was told they confessed their sins. It was a barbarious act, and a beastly sight. These were the lower castes—the Pariahs.

A few days after this I went to see them burn their dead. Englishmen and Americans usually bury their dead. The Persians expose theirs on Towers of Silence, and leave them exposed to be destroyed by eagles, vultures, and birds of prey; while the Hindoos burn their dead. I heartily wish that all nations and races everywhere would understand this matter of cremation, and so changeth from burying of their dead to the burning of them. The buried dead only decay, rot, and from particles of putried matter to poison the surrounding soil. Burning is far healthier than burying the decayed body in the ground, where the water can sweep through, then pass down into cisterns and wells, to be afterwards drunk by the people. It is liable to contain bacteria, spores, germs of typhoid fever, and death. Go with me up the Ganges some morning. There is an old brick building roofless. We stand by the outer gate, and there is soon brought a corpse, borne upon men's shoulders—a girl of some twelve years of age, a spot of red paint upon her forhead, an indication of her betrothal. The mouth wide open was a hideous sight. They lowered the corpse and I saw them lay it across the bamboo-wood, spice-wood and sandal wood, the pyre was about four feet high. They put the corpse thereon, poured oil on it, and then touched the firebrand, and the whole flamed up and speedily consumed the corpse. In half an hour or more there was not an atom remaining with the exception of a few small bones which were handed over to the mother. Without one sigh or tear she took these bones home with her as a precious momento, and I thought how much wiser this was than to lay a corpse in the earth to be eaten by worms or to decay and become a mass of putrid matter, poisoning the adjacent streams.

After a time I went southward, because I heard that occult phenomena, that magicians were more numerous in the south of India, especially about Madras. I must see them, I said, and, so I set out and soon saw them in their bungalows and in their tents, at least, several of them. They tried to make the Mango seed grow up before me. It was a complete failure; worse, it was a complete fraud. I saw them try to do the basket trick, and was satisfied that that was a barefaced fraud also; but I did see some very astonishing things, and I can only account for them by psychic force and invisible helps. I saw one old Yogi doing strange, almost miraculous things, and getting the most astonishing results. "Have you a handkerchief," said the weird old Yogi? Hand it to me and I will burn it, and it will be remade before your eyes." He took my handkerchief in his hands; and then saying prayers until the perspiration streamed from his face, put a match to the handkerchief, and it was soon in flames and burnt to ashes. He took from his bag a piece of cloth two feet or so square and stepping back began to say his prayers over again. In a short time he took a little rod and passed it over the cloth, and lifting it up, the handkerchief was perfect again. It had been by the fire and the psychic force dematerialized, and by some Psychic power again materialized. It was otherwise unexplainable.

Further, I saw him take in his hands three balls as large as hen's eggs, and began tossing them not in the tent, but in the open street, and he kept on tossing them until by and by the balls kept rising of themselves higher and higher, and so far as I know they are rising yet, for they never came back. Where they went to I cannot say or explain, save by some occult unseen psychical power or force of his.

I saw magic to my heart's content. Black magic, white magic, and grey. Black magic is something really fearful. It is demoniac from dark, depraved spirits. It is to be scrupulously shunned. It is voudouism in India. Touching these phenomena I have my own ideas, and they are firm as a rock. Josephus and Jesus speak of demons, and give rules for casting them away. Black magic is a very low form of occultism. These Hindoos are adepts in casting out demons. Daily I saw it done. I was at the Vishnu Temple on a Tuesday, in Bangalore, about five o'clock, when a woman with her hair dishevelled, poorly clad, was brought and placed down before the priest, as one fully possessed by a demon. Her eyes were sunken, her head was rolling. She was dumb. The priest came in and took her psychic symptoms. He then went out to a tree, repeated prayers, and cutting a branch, brought it in and beat her with it. He then sacrificed and sprinkled her with what they denominated sacred water. He stepped back and firmly said "Leave, leave, leave," but the demon held his ground, so the priest took up the branch again and severely beat her. He then rushed at her, and striking her on the forehead felled her to the ground. Every muscle and nerve now became stiff as iron. She lay a short time in a kind of deep breathing. Soon her eyes opened, became bright, and the color returned to her face. She rose up, smiled, clasped her mother and was all right. This was a fact. I saw similar performances time and again. In America I have also seen spirit mediums possessed with demons. All is not sunshine in mediumship. I will state the truth just as it is. There is a summer land, but also a winter land over there as well, and the lower spheres include demons, for there are low, depraved human beings passing on just as they were here, and death is no savior. Human beings commence over there just where they left this life, mentally, morally, and spiritually.

To my sorrow, I once saw Dr. Dunn possessed by a demon. I have been asked many times "where is Dr. Dunn now?" He was here with me twenty-five years ago. I may say he still lives, and is an inspirational medium to some extent, residing in the city of Rockford, Illinois. He is the Mayor of the City, I think, and has become very wealthy, and with increasing riches has lost his spiritual gifts to a large extent. No man can serve both God and Mammon. This is as true now as in the time of the Apostles. But to Dr. Dunn's demon obsession. I was sailing in a ship with him to China, and on the ship were 117 Chinamen, and with this gang there were two different Societies. They quarreled at times most furiously, and once began to fight. Dr. Dunn, with the ship captain, rushed into the fight to secure peace, and began to fight with them. This was the demon's opportunity. He had become possessed by an old pompous French spirit who wanted to control him on several previous occasions. I knew this spirit as a wilful and powerful demon spirit. Dr. Dunn was entranced by him, and you cannot imagine the disagreeable change that came over him for the two or three days that he was possessed by this spirit. He walked about in a dignified, self-important, and most haughty manner, talking to and ordering me as if I were his servant. "I have got him," he said, "and I am going to use him to some good purpose now." I was troubled and greatly annoyed, but I had faith in God and in the higher powers. Every Thursday we held a seance in our cabin. This is our seance, I remarked kindly to Dr. Dunn. The spirit pompously replied, "You must postpone the seances for awhile, as I am doing for the medium a very marvellous work." "No," was my prompt reply, "I shall do nothing of the kind." The seance hour came on at 3 o'clock; and I almost forced Dr. Dunn into our state-room. Then locking the door, I exclaimed to the control, now I've got you, and I took both his hands in mine and held them firmly, calling on God, holy angels, and spirit friends to cast out this boasting, self-conceited demon spirit. My grasp I determinedly kept until he trembled and literally shook with rage. It was a fearful moment! The medium's eyes became bloodshot, and his mouth twitched and frothed. I held on with a determined will till his body relaxed. He now gradually became limp, when his familiar Indian spirit entranced him, exclaiming "I've got him, preach." You go away you old demon. Go away you old devil-spirit! Aye, there are demons in the lower spheres, the surrounding spirit world, but they will not, and cannot trouble you if you think right, live right, do right, and spiritually conduct yourselves aright. Remember to act in the seance room in a most calm, proper, and religious manner. Let there be no nonsense, no selfishness; be wise, thoughtful, careful, prayerful, and you will attract the presence of pure loving spirits and exalted angels to brighten and beautify the pathway of life.

Later, while in India, I went out to see a peculiar old Brahmin, that, as reported, had been buried seven months underground, six feet in the sand and soil; and he was still alive. I did not see this occult phenomenon but honorable men, Englishmen, Scotchmen, and natives did see it. It was something like this. Let me first say you believe that the common house-fly in cold weather becomes dormant, and in a wall or crevice will remain six months seemingly dead; but spring's sunshine revives it. You have heard about the winter torpidity of the American dor-mouse. The raccoon also rolls up in his own fur in hollow trees four or five months, to all appearance dead. I give you this bit of Hindoo history as given to me. I saw this man, and he declared that he wished to be again buried. First of all, they prepared him for the feat. He drank some juice to soothe his nerves, they then bathed his skin with oil, they also put wax over his mouth, they filled his ears and nose with wax also, and then seemingly mesmerized him, putting the man in a box, wrapped in dry muslin, and lowered the whole into the ground, covering the same with sand and soil. Over this they planted flower seeds, which sprang up and bloomed and bore their blossoms. At the end of seven months they removed the earth, and opening the casket they laid him in the warm sunshine, removed the wax, bathed the body and then an old Brahmin Yogi commandingly spoke to him, took him by the left hand, and breathing into his mouth and lungs, the man caught his breath and lived. You stop your clock, take off the weight, said a Brahmin to me, and it no longer ticks, put on the weight and the clock moves. Well, he added, this body of ours is only a shell—a piece of complex machinery, and why not be stopped for a season and then run on again, keeping time as before. Another marvelous thing was that of an old Yogi who had the mystic power to move things by his will. At three o'clock, when the sun was shining brightly overhead, to see a manifestation of will power we entered a bungalow of an old Yogi of the mountains, who was in the habit of fasting and daily repeating his prayers. He was a vegetarian. As a preliminary he burned incense, prayed, and said I now have the power to move anything in this room by my will. Well, said my friend, "Doctor, ask him to move some object." Seeing a book lying on the table I said, "command that book to move by your will." Pointing to it with tremulous hand, he said "come, come!" The table quivered, trembled, and the book slid along to his feet. Now, do not tell me that I was mesmerized. All my faculties were intensely awake to watch and criticise. Each and all saw this phenomena. When he had moved books, peacock plumes, and other things around the room, I said to him, "Tell us how you did that." "Oh," said he, "that would require more skill in language and power, than to do these wonders. And then, you, an American, living in that great enlightened western country, ask of me, heathen, as Christians call us, how we do these things! I believe in Brahma, sir. In the universal fire, the universal light, the infinite life, and that by Almighty power Brahma moves all those starry worlds by his will; and just in the ratio that I become Brahma-like, control my passions, purify my blood, spiritualize my nature, and make myself more interiorily divine like Brahma, do I have power to move these smaller things." Brahma's will moves all worlds and systems. Now suppose he had died that night, he is the same identical man over there; and being the same spirit-man there, why not by his will again move tables, books,—all these smaller things? Spirits do this by their will. They entrance the living, make impressions, fill rooms with their aura, and psychically move material things. Angels rolled away the stone from the door of the sepulchre. The Bible is full of these spiritual phenomena. When asked "What have you seen," I hardly know where to commence, because for fully forty-six years or more I have seen these marvels in all civilized countries, and I wonder how anybody with an inquiring mind and a good fair cranial organization can doubt these phenomena. What shall I say first? In earlier years, before studying medicine, I was a preacher, and an honest one. I candidly preached the best theology that I knew. Have sympathy for the clergy, as most of them, while honest, live on faith and donations. They have my sympathy.

At length I heard that there was a medium, a Mrs. Tamlin, in New York, that had the "spirit raps." What a "fad," I exclaimed, what arrant nonsense. A Quaker friend of mine, a member of the Legislature, said to me one day, "come let us have a look at this spirit rapping." Attending the seance we heard sounds, spirit rappings, sounds on the table. There must be machinery I thought, in the room, and I boldly said it is done by machinery. Then the knocks came still louder, jarring the table. Finally, I said, knock somewhere else, if you are spirits, and rap rap came on the walls overhead, and then, to my discomfort, on my own coat collar! Surely, I exclaimed, there is no machinery about that. I was excited, startled, and could not explain the phenomena. It was wonderful! Now came the most marvelous thing. It was spelt out that "Melissa Peebles, a cousin of mine, died on Christmas morning at eleven o'clock" This was surely a falsehood, I said, for she is quite well and hearty. But writing to her friends, I found out afterwards that she was dead. Her spirit had actually come. It was to me very astonishing—an unquestionable test.

Later, I was at Judge Edmonds (Supreme Bench Judge) a grand old man, dignified, solid, and true to the core. It was the family's seance night in New York, and among those present was a young priest of Athens, Greece. He had seen Mammoth Cave, Niagara Falls, and our great grass-clad prairies, and now he wanted to see the last new thing in America, viz, the much-talked-of spirit rappings. So we formed the circle, Judge Edmonds' daughter being a writing medium. Soon she was entranced, speaking in a tongue utterly unknown to myself and the Judge, but the young priest listened most eagerly, caught every word, and soon sat back in his chair astounded, sighing his mother's name. He said "It is my mother, my mother," in modern Greek. The message informed him that his mother was in the spirit world, although he thought her perfectly well. After he returned home, he wrote back to the judge that it was quite true—quite true his mother had passed during his absence into the spirit land.

Here I must speak of Aaron Knight and Dr Dunn, who first became entranced at my residence. This Knight readily, perfectly entrancing Dunn, he came year after year, often several times a week, and for fourteen years I talked with him just as familiarly as I now address or converse with you. One seance night when Dr. Dunn was fully entranced by this spirit, he said, "I will give you, as you desire it, a little life sketch in brief." "I was born in Yorkshire, England, my death was clearly and unfortunate. My brother, the Rev. Jas Knight, was an ordained English clergyman. This was about 200 years ago." He described to me the river Ouse, the Cathedral, the old Abbey, and the topography of the surrounding country. I had then never been to Yorkshire or England, so I determined at sometime to identify this spirit if possible. Accordingly, when we reached Yorkshire many years afterwards, I looked, while in Yorkshire, for the Knights' names in the libraries old and new and failed. Finally Robt. Green, Esq., suggested that I should look in the "Will Office," and accordingly we went back through the records, aided by the clerk, 200 years, (in Latin) where we found the family name of Rev. J. Knight, A.M., ordained in Savoy, and preaching occasionally in London. The whole thing was confirmed, a most astounding test, and I have had these or similar tests by thousands year after year, till I can no more doubt them than I can doubt my own existence. And they are spiritually dear to me above all price, because they demonstrate a future existence. They transform faith into knowledge. The Spiritualist can say with Paul, "For we know" if this earthly house were destroyed, we have a house not made with hands, in the heavens.

Spirit ministries are to me positive, tangible facts. The spirit is deathless, dying is being born into the higher life of immortality, progression is a law over there as it is here, and to the very depths of my soul I appreciate these living truths, they are in harmony with the great law of evolution. They are in agreement with pure reason, they are in accordance with the heart's sweetest hopes, they are in unison with the spiritual revelations of all bibles, and in perfect consonance with the soul's highest aspirations. And I say it deliberately, take from me my good name if you will—persecute me to the stake—rob me of my friends—clothe me in rags—drive me into some dungeon cell where no sunbeam can touch my forehead—do all these if you will, but tear not, I pray you, from my soul the beautful, inspiring, uplifting truth of spirit manifestations.

It is fully fifty-five years ago that I was standing in the pulpit in McLean, New York, preaching the funeral sermon of a little boy, an only child of doting wealthy parents. The text was, "Have faith in God;" and the burden of the sermon was the importance of faith in the hours of sickness and death. The discourse finished, friends stepped forward to see the corpse, beautiful, though cold, in a casket, half buried in flowers. At length the fond parents moved forward, and standing by the coffin the father completely broke down, the tears streaming down his face. He wept, and wept as though his great father heart would break—but the mother half dazed and tearless stood pale and white as a Parian statue. There is a sorrow, a grief too deep for tears. Though Jesus wept at Lazarus' grave, this heart-broken mother could not weep—but turning to me she spoke thus with an eloquence that I can never forget—"Oh, my pastor! you've spoken to me hopefully, beautifully, about faith. But my darling is dead, and my aching, bleeding, mourning mother's heart demands something more than faith, faith. Then she burst into a flood of tears, and chokingly continued—"Tell me what you know about the future world. My soul calls for knowledge. Shall I know my child there? Will he know me? Will he ever be with me?" * * * I stood speechless, dumb as a stone statue! Though knowing just as much as any other priest, I knew nothing of the future life. Hope and faith did not satisfy this mother. They can satisfy no thinker. What some ancient Isaiah, or Peter, or James saw is not knowledge to me, nor you. Spiritualism gives this knowledge. And Spiritualists following the apostolic injunction have added to faith * * * knowledge. To that mother I could now say—your cherub child is not dead. He has left the body for the better land—left as a bud to be transplanted in to the gardens of the gods, where angels are teachers.

"The angels have need of these lovely buds
In their gardens so fair;
They graft them on immortal stems
To bloom for ever there."

When his mother crosses the crystal river she will see the outstretched arms, the shining hands, and hear the tender musical voice—"Welcome mother, welcome mother, to this home of love, these isles of the blest."

This being Spiritualism, what energy, zeal, enthusiasm, it should call forth from those who have drank from its life-giving fountains. And yet, many professed Spiritualists are indifferent, sleepy, selfish, wrapped up in this world's worldliness. They are half dead, and don't know it. Others are fully dead, and ought to have their funeral sermons preached. This should be the text —"Awake thou that sleepest, and Christ, the living Christ of spirit ministries shall give you life and light. Only the true and the worthy, in any world, enter heaven—the heaven of unalloyed bliss."

Some Interesting Statements.

E. V. WILSON AS A PROPHET—THOMAS PAINE THE AUTHOR OF JUNIUS LETTERS—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

To the Editor:—"The Truths of Spiritualism," by the late E.V. Wilson is before me for the first time, and I find it full of interest. He devotes a few pages to a matter of special interest to me. I heard him lecture several times. On the 7th of February, 1872, at Washington, D. C., he makes the following record:

"We found on our desk a book, "Junius Unmasked; or Thomas Paine the author of the Letters of Junius and the Declaration of Independence. Washington, D. C. John Gray and Co., Publishers, 1872." Accompanying the book was a note:

"E. V. Wilson, Esq.:—Dear Sir:—It is said that before this book was published, your publicly prophesied, or stated, that Thomas Paine was the author of the Junius Letters, as well as the Declaration of Independence. Will you be kind enough to state before your audience the facts in this matter, Truly your friend ——.'"

Joel Moody was the writer of that letter. He came from Mound City, Kansas, early in January 1872, with all the stereotype plates of his book prepared in Cincinnati, ready for publication at the Capitol. He read to me many of the proof sheets and I became convinced of the truth of his discovery. It was I who informed him that E. V. Wilson had stated the year before on the platform in Washington, that Paine was Junius; whereupon Mr. Moody addressed the above letter to Mr. Wilson, who at his next lecture said that as early as December 1859, under spirit influence, in Melodeon Hall, Cincinnati, he had spoken as follows: "I, Thomas Paine, declare to this audience, and acknowledge the authorship of the Junius Letters, and I drew the first draft of the Declaration of Independence."

Again in September, 1862, in the office of Judge Knowlton of Chicago, Mr. Wilson said to him:

"Ere ten years have passed the positive proof shall be given to the world that Paine was Junius." Again in 1865 and in 1867 he made declarations of Paine's authorship; and in 1869, at Algonquin, Ill., on the 4th of July, under influence he said:

"I wrote 'The Crisis,' 'The Age of Reason,' and the 'Junius Letters;' and now that the overthrow of African slavery hath been accomplished, I turn my attention, as an agitator, to the Old World. And now let the skeptic take note. We shall at once move upon Rome and France, the strongholds of religious and political dispotism. Both powers must fall. And on the 1st of January, 1872, the power of France shall be broken; Napoleon III. without a throne and the Pope a prisoner in the Vatican. England and the United States shall shake hands in friendship over the Alabama claims; England will bluster and threaten to go behind her bond and pledge; the United States will not retreat or abate, but will stand firm by her claim. Judgment will be rendered. Will England abide the judgement? I doubt it, but trust that she will. I, Thomas Paine, prophetically declare these things."—Page 351.

Mr. Wilson might have added that a year or two later he again declared from the platform in Washington that Paine was Junius. I heard him, and a friend by my side remarked to me, "Absurd; the writer of the Junius Letters was Sir Philip Francis."

Mr. Wilson discusses the subject further and says:

"We feel that 'Junius Unmasked' is a work of merit, and adds one more proof of the good there is in Spiritualism."

And here let me add that Mr. Moody's discovery was made apparently by spirit guidance. I will repeat substantially his own statement to me before his book had gone to press:

"I had been trying to achieve success as a lecturer, but had failed financially. I had recently bought a small library in exchange for a team of horses and wagon. Many of the books I had not opened. One day in a despondent state of mind I arose from my chair without any conscious object, reached my hand to a shelf in my library and placed it on a small book entitled 'Letters of Junius.' Something said to me, not audibily, 'Paine was the author of that book.' Starting back I exclaimed aloud to myself, 'Is that so?' Taking the book down and looking at the date of the first letter I read 'January 21, 1769.' Turning to the last letter I saw it dated 'January 21, 1772.' Where was Paine during these three years? The New American Cyclopedia anwered: He was an excise officer of the British Government, stationed at Lewes, about forty miles south of London. How old was he? From thirty-two to thirty-five years. When did he come to America? Near the close of the year 1774."

Mr. Moody further told me that at that time he had never read twenty pages of Junius or of Paine, but at once he began reading and comparing the two authors and in three months the task was completed. He found more than 300 parallels of fact, opinion, character, style, etc. He noted the singular fact that Paine never once alluded to Junius. Many figures of speech were the same, several illustrations were identical, and were of such a character that the chances that another should have made them are as infinity to one. Not a solitary incompatible fact could be found, and the few apparent contradictions proved to be positive evidences of a common authorship.

I asked Mr. Moody if he was a Spiritualist. He said he was not; but yet from certain statements he made I inferred that he was more than half a convert to the spiritual philosophy, and he could not deny the occult source of his first impression in regard to the identity of Paine as Junius. Mr. Moody wished to be unknown for a while as the author of the book; consequently I became its god-father and, to many, its reputed author. I have since made further discoveries of Paine's secret work, some of which are noted in my pamphlet "Thomas Paine—Was he Junius?" In connection with this discovery I note the following remarkable coincidence of dates: January 21, 1769, first letter of Junius; January 21, 1772, last letter of Junius; January 21, 1872, first People's meeting on Sunday in Washington; January 21, 1872, first public announcement at said meeting by me of the literary discovery; January 21, 1872, first copy of the book from the press exhibited by me; January 21, 1872, date of publication from sterotype plates of the book.

So far as I was concerned there was no premeditation in regard to any of these dates; the meeting was appointed without reference to any date. And I further note three more coincidences: The first issue of a revolutionary weekly paper in London called "The Crisis," whose principal contributor was "Casca," now identified as Thomas Paine, was January 21, 1775. King Louis of France, whose life Paine sought to save, was beheaded January 21, 1793. And I have a copper token on one face of which is a man hanging on a gibbet, with the inscription, "End of Pain," and on the other face an open book with the inscription, "Wrongs of Man" on one page and January 21, 1793, the date of the king's execution on the other.

That Philip Francis was not Junius I proved in 1886 by an alibi. And last year two letters of Junius were discovered, published in 1773 and 1774, after the regular series and in another newspaper, neither of which letters could have been written by Francis. He had sailed for India five months before the publication of the letter of 1774, and that of 1773 was on "Priestcraft," a subject which Junius had treated so gingerly that no one could know whether he was a Christian or a skeptic. But the sentiments of the letter of 1773 are those expressed by Paine in his "Age of Reason" twenty years later, and diametrically opposite to the religious opinions of Sir Philip Francis, who was a churchman and half papist.

Great Flaws in the Bible--Without Inspiration.

New York, March 21.—The Church of the Messiah, Thirty-fourth street and Park avenue, was packed to the doors this morning, when Rev. Minot J. Savage began his sermon on "Revelations, Natural and Progressive."

"The word of God," he said, is being written every day. Each discovery of the telescope, of the microscope, adds a page to that word of revelation. By these discoveries the eyes obtain new insight into old truths, and God reveals Himself anew to the reader.

"Do not be led astray by those who would tell you that those men who are seeking to gain new insight are enemies of God. No; such are His consistent friends."

There was no warrant, he said, for declaring the Bible the exclusive word of God; in fact, the preacher said, we had no inspired copy of the Bible. While he would not assail the Bible, he did assail the position of those who accepted it as all true and infallible. But some would hurl at him that passage of Timothy, "All scripture is written by inspiration and is profitable," and so forth. That, he said, was an incorrect rendering. As originally written it was:

"Every scripture that was written by inspiration is profitable," etc. And some, the preacher said, would remind him of the maledictions of the writer of the last book of the Bible upon any, who should add to or take away, etc. But this only refers to "this book," not to the whole Bible.

Rev. Savage then went on to state that since he had learned to regard the Bible in the light of reason and not to accept it blindly and unreasonably, as he had been brought up to do, he could see and appreciate its beauties to a much greater degree. He wondered why it was that so many theologians of the present day persisted in declaring for the infallibility of a book, a brief comparison of the several divisions of which proves its inaccuracies.

In conclusion the preacher said that some of the descriptions of parts of the Old Testament were so grotesque and barbaric that scholars were almost ashamed to argue against them. It was the utterly baseless claims of ignorant men regarding the book, and not the book itself, he would proclaim against.

He could not believe if this was God's only revelation to man that being almighty and all good, he would have permitted by far the greater portions of his people to remain in ignorance of it with a steady stream of the doomed plunging incessantly into hell.

"Is God," he added, "radiating knowledge upon only a chosen handful while the masses grope in darkness? No, I believe God's revelations to his people are to be made in the great book of nature, through the medium of science, fresh and bright day by day."

DEMONIAC INFLUENCE AT A PRIZE FIGHT.

HOW IT WAS MANIFESTED BY A WOMAN, AS WELL AS MEN AT THE BRUTAL PRIZE FIGHT AT CARSON.

According to the press dispatches from the prize fight at Carson, Nevada, between Corbett and Fitzsimmons, The Chicago Record says that one of the most dramatic features of the battle was the part Mrs. Fitzsimmons played in the victory of her husband. Never before in the history of the prize ring has a woman witnessed the struggle of her husband for pugilistic honors and the new champion's wife to-day established a precedent which will hardly ever be equaled.

Up to the night before the fight Mrs. Fitzsimmons declared she would not be present at the ringside, but at the last moment, despite advice of her friends, she insisted on accompanying her husband. She was vigorously cheered when she entered the arena and appeared entirely self-contained and unconcerned as she took her seat in a chair near Bob's corner.

As he came down the slope from his dressing-room Fitz stopped for a moment at his wife's side and, stooping, kissed her as she said cheerily, "Good luck to you, Bob."

For the first few rounds she sat quietly, but as the rounds became hotter her excitement mastered her, and for the remainder of the battle she stood upon the floor or chair, excitedly encouraging her husband or hurling reproaches and instructions at his seconds. As the battle went on she became more and more demonstrative, sometimes breaking out with exclamations which bordered on the profane.

At every blow which her lanky spouse received from his antagonist her eyes bulged out and with her fists clenched she cried:

INTERESTING EXPERIENCES

IMPEDIMENT OMINOUS OF DISASTER—WEIRD INFLUENCES THAT DEFEAT HUMAN WILL—FAILURES THAT WERE FINALLY TRACED TO OBSESSION.

"My phenomenal visitations have been quite different from any I have yet heard narrated," said a gentleman from Hamilton, who objects to the use of his name in a printed report. "I am not decided as to how I should classify the things which came to me, but most of them are impedimental and may be firmly described under the title 'Hindrances.' They are a species of obsession, and most annoyingly nettling and rude, preventing work, pleasure, and sometimes the most ordinary performance of duty. Without actual experience no one can appreciate their persistent intrusiveness and destructive action, imposing unexpected and disagreeable tasks, always resultless of profit or good, in place of efforts planned for securing prosperity and happiness, says the Cincinnati Enquirer.

"Often they defeat the best intentions and make abortive the most carefully matured plans. They have impelled me to disregard important engagements upon which my financial prosperity was hinged, treat social obligations with disdain, and imperil my integrity in ways almost irreparable. I can give many instances of the fatal influences thus exercised, and they have brought upon me the charge of deficient will power, a disposition to vacillate and a tendency to dishonesty, to all of which I plead

NOT GUILTY.

"I am cabined, cribbed, confined and bound by fetters stronger than those of steel in subservience to invisible forces, undefined, but autocratically exacting and bent upon mischief. I will make this claim sufficiently apparent by a few illustrations, and can give hundreds of the same kind.

"At the age of twenty-two I was paying assiduous attentions to a lovable girl, whom I expected to marry. She was pretty, intelligent, refined, and in my eyes, a model of feminine grace. Our families were intimate and the two mothers seemed to enjoy the prospect of a closer alliance through the apparently impending marriage of the daughter with myself. Everybody was willing, but I had not yet made a proposal to the lady. I appointed an evening to call upon her, intending to seize that opportunity for sounding her upon the all-important subject, and I made an elaborate toilet so that I might secure a favorable impression of a rather plain and unornamental personality.

"My thoughts that evening were upon nothing but this call till I passed out of the house and was walking across the large yard to the street. Then it occurred to me that on the route to the home of my inamorate there lived another remarkably attractive girl, to whom, theoretically, I owed a call, and, the hour being early, I resolved to see her for a brief hour. Really, something else resolved for me, proved by the fact that when I sought to combat this diversion of intent the inclination to indulge in it was fiercely vitalized, and I felt myself hur[illegible] along by its propelling forc[illegible] powerless against it.

"In the presence of this girl I experienced a variety of emotions wholly indescribable. Her influence was magnetic, and she wielded it adroitly, as if without meditation. I lingered beyond the allotted time, far beyond the limit of a conventional call, fascinated to a point which disposed me to neglect the real business for which I started out, and ere long my mind was filled with 'unproportioned thought.' That was the only call I made that evening. I did not go further to fare either better or worse, but proposed to the girl of whom I had never before thought as a wife, was accepted, and went home

MENTALLY INTOXICATED.

"Sleep sobered me. Next morning I regretted the fatuity of the night. How to undo it was too strong a problem, however, and, after puzzling over it for hours, I concluded to let circumstances govern the outcome. Promptly they came to my aid on the very next evening, accompanied by the mother-in-law of my affianced wife.

"Much as my mother was surprised at the call—the two ladies not being on calling terms, because they were members of different churches—she was infinitely more surprised when she learned its object. I had seen my mamma-in-law, in posse, enter the house, and, moved by apprehension, had hastened to a place where I could hear without being seen. I was just in time to catch a sentence from my mother to this effect:

"'John has proposed to your daughter! Stuff, Mrs. M.! I'm sure he's looking much higher than that—up instead of down from his own position. I know his preference among young ladies, and it's very decided for one 'bright, particular,' before whom your daughter would utterly fail to shine or even glimmer. Your Clara is either beside herself or has mistaken some common suitor for our John, but her short-sightedness excuses her for just this once. I hope she will not repeat the mistake.'

"The caller was very angry at these words and immediately resorted to vile epithets, unfit for repetition. My mother replied in anger and indulged in remarks still more provoking than those already mentioned. The ladies parted in a pet which they themselves had fanned to a white heat, and then I was sought and implored to explain. I told the facts in much the same way I have now related them, and my kind mater berated me for a fool.

"'Not responsible!' she exclaimed, in irony. 'Led away against your will, you poor ninny! Why, that's weaker talk than a baby would use. How long have you been in love with Clara M.?'

"I couldn't say that there was any love involved. Something had carried me off my feet. I intimated, and under that influence I had surrendered to Miss Clara because she and not the real sweetheart was at hand. I regretted the awkward occurrence——"

"'Let it pass,' interrupted the good mother, 'and call upon the lady to whom you owe a superior duty. Do not fail to ask the all-important question, and agree upon an early day for its practical answer.'

"Taking a roundabout course to avoid the danger before experienced, when little more that halfway to the home of my real sweetheart I met Miss Clara M. in a side street, unaccompanied, and nothing short of rudeness would have excused me from turning about and escorting her whithersoever she desired to go.

"'Oh, dear John,' said she; I'm so delighted to see you, for mother is enraged at our engagement because you did not ask her consent. Come now and see her.'

"I tried to excuse myself till a more convenient season, but no; Miss Clara was in earnest and wanted the matter settled then, and she was so gently persuasive, affectionate and sweet that I could not hold out against her pleadings, especially as something pushed me along to emphasize my rapidly arousing inclination. Clara's mother had recalled her amiability, and, after a long discussion of the merits of her girl, cordially assented to our engagement. Again I remained late, and although it was a cold night, went home so warm with love that the thermometer might have registered 100 above or below zero without affecting my temperature. Next day I was in misery again. When mother asked if I had been successful in obtaining the lady's consent, not designating what lady, I made a COMPROMISE WITH CONSCIENCE.

And answered affirmatively. When she said with joyful exultation that she must call immediately and embrace her future daughter-in-law I begged her to wait till I had again seen the girl and prepared her for the interview.

"'She has been prepared longer than you think,' said the dear mother. 'I began the discussion with her several months ago, and we have had an understanding since that time that when you proposed she would accept, and thereafter she would receive no calls of congratulation till she had seen me. I am going at once.'

"'But I have an engagement to go there now.'

"'All the better; we'll go as company for each other.'

"'This time I prefer to go by myself, mother.'

"'And particularly this time I prefer to have your company.'

"The awkwardness of my dilemma may be appreciated by those who are unadept at white lies. We went together, and upon our arrival the whole miserable story came out, for the news of my engagement with Miss Clara had preceded us, and the lie of the engagement about which I had misled my mother slapped me in the face with stinging effect.

"The embarrassment was intensified by the declaration of the girl whose love I had forfeited that on both evenings when I had represented myself as enjoying her company I had spent all the time with her successful rival. You know who it is that refers to a woman scorned, and what he says on the subject. He could have used more and stronger words without overdoing it, as I then found out to my sorrow. The young female whom I had thought all gentleness charged me with perfidy, trickery, fickleness, everything unholy, and underscoring her arraignment by shoving into my hands all the trinkets I had ever given her, threw open the door and insisted on my immediate departure. Mother was aghast. She saw the uselessness of an attempt to appease the angry beauty and followed my disgraceful exit from the house. And a few days later when I called upon Miss Clara she had heard of the rumpus and all the circumstances that led up to it—especially the lies—and from her presence I was sent packing like a veritable culprit. How could I explain to any of these people that my rascality was involuntary? But certainly it was.

"I have been quite an inventor, and am now the patentee of six desirable implements. Upon one of these I spent most of the time for three years, when it should have been completed in as many months. Only one little addition was needed to make it perfect, and I knew what this was and that it could be readily obtained in a few hours for more than thirty months before it was finally utilized. Not that I was indifferent, indolent or short of means, but every time I made a move to possess myself of this desideratum something was presented to my mind as of more importance to be accomplished first, and invariably this was supplemented by something else itself suggested, till a long list of inconsiderable things drove the other idea completely away for that occasion, and this process was repeated every time the impression came to me that my invention should be hastened to completion. At last I employed a man to procure the part desired and complete the work, which was a surrender to the force with which I was too weak to cope, and I am convinced that never would the work have been completed had I not have delegated it.

"I hope you get the idea I am attempting to convey. It looks like a contradiction of the doctrine of free agency, but perhaps is only an exception to prove the rule. Utterly it is able to control me in every act. Once I needed an ingredient in a certain liquid compound used as a stain. For weeks I was prevented from going for it, but it was at length obtained and I essayed to use it. Instead of pouring it into the proper compound I added it to a keg of vinegar, destroying both liquids. Procuring it again, the receptacle in which it was conveyed sprang a leak and every drop was lost. I was compelled to delegate further efforts to another, and he commanded success.

"Eleven years ago I took a contract which my principals were anxious to have pushed, and they promised me a premium of for any period by which the contract time was shortened. Things went swimmingly for a season, and then a series of disasters intervened which were unaccountable on every theory outside of diabolism. Workmen were killed or fell sick and died suddenly; horses fell dead or sickened and died; tools and implements valued at hundreds of dollars were stolen every week; two workshops were destroyed by incendiary fires; the bank where I kept my deposit failed, and a trusted clerk decamped with the funds for a two weeks payroll.

"Impediments of all kinds had delayed us, and we were more than a month behind schedule time when the date for the completion of the contract expired. At noon of that last day I fell from an elevation and broke both legs, and an hour later my superintendent was instantly killed by the premature discharge of a rock blast. My principals insisted that I must forfeit $50 per day for all time the contract was in default, and I emerged from that job in debt more than $40,000, with nothing to satisfy it. Just as I was able to get about once more a relative died and I received $9,000 under his will. With this I compromised my debts, and commenced life again without a cent in the world. A few days afterward I attended a spiritualistic seance, was pronounced a victim of obsession, and told how to avoid its evil encroachments in future. Also, at the same time I was promised guidance of good spirits in the conduct of my affairs. I am yet at times controlled by unfriendly influences, but the help promised has come in fair measure, and I am reasonably prosperous.

"Let me add a word upon the subject which from my standpoint, is full of interest. Free agency does not universally obtain, and I think only partially with anyone. We are led by influences superior to ourselves in strength of will and determined action, sometimes for good, but oftener to our undoing. Instances of this kind that would make your hearts bleed are on record, where the best intentions and highest motives have been frustrated by the sneaking devils who crawl into men's brains unawares and work terrible destruction."

NOW IN SPIRIT LIFE.

A VETERAN SPIRITUALIST GONE—CAPTAIN SAMUEL G. CABELL OF WASHINGTON D. C., PASSES ON—END OF A LONG, HONORABLE AND EVENTFUL LIFE.

A long, wide bow of royal purple satin ribbon, surmounted by a sheaf of wheat, fully ripe, were the token which indicated to those who to-day passed by the house No. 110 2d street southeast, that the long and eventful life of Capt. Samuel G. Cabell, who lived there for many years, had come to a close. That crepe, the usual badge of mourning, was not used, was in deference to the oft-expressed wish of Capt. Cabell, who said that he did not want his family to grieve after his death.

The above is from the Washington Times. It was the privilege of the writer to know Capt. Cabell and his devoted wife for many years, and to have been the first speaker he ever heard in the cause of Spiritualism. Having his interest thus awakened he went on and on until the day of his release.

It was under these circumstances, particularly opportune, that his release from earth-life occurred just before the convening of the board of the N. S. A., for it was his express wish, as well as that of his wife, that the writer might be one of those chosen to officiate at the services, and also that Mr. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., might also speak.

The large mansion was thrown open to the Spiritualists and other friends and every inch of available room in both houses was filled.

The beautiful token at the door, a violet sash with a sheaf of wheat, told the story of the birth into spirit life, and the entire absence of the conventional crepe, together with the presence of masses of beautiful flowers, made the occasion more like a solemn festival than a funeral; in fact, it was a testimonial of praise to his worth as a man and of rejoicing that he was set free from suffering.

Professor Maxim, formerly of Massachusetts, furnished the music, singing those selections adapted to the occasion as only he can sing.

Mr Barrett's remarks followed the invocation by the guides of the writer, and later on the address and poem by the latter completed the services.

Those who have attended spiritualistic services, on similar occasions know how they differ from the depressing rituals of the religions of fear and doubt.

Fully half the numbers of those present were members of orthodox and other churches, many of whom had never heard an address from a Spiritualist before. Such a life with so peaceful a close, and such suitable services to bear memory and tribute, do much to spread the gospel of Spiritualism among those who need it.

Mrs. Cabell's demeanor during the whole of this trying ordeal, has been just what you would expect in one of noble nature, chastened by sorrow, but strengthened by those who bend from the inner and higher realm. She was calm, tender and full of the glorious knowledge that her beloved husband had arisen from the feeble form and few faults of earth, into noble spiritual existence.

May she continue to feel the strength of his presence through all earthly days.

VERY SIGNIFICANT.

The Progressive Thinker leads. It publishes more reading matter than any other dollar Spiritualist paper on this green earth. It was the only Spiritualist paper that had enterprise enough to publish President Barrett's address before the National Convention at Washington. It covered three pages of the paper. It now proposes to send out 1,000,000 copies of the paper containing his address.

Read the announcement on fifth page, headed "Fifteen Cents," for particulars.

MASS MEETING AT DAYTON, O.

A mass-meeting of the Spiritualists of Dayton has been called to convene at Knights' of Honor Hall, Third street, on Saturday evening, April 24, for the purpose of forming a permanent organization; and also to co-operate with E. B. Helm in his evangelical work in the fields of Spiritualism. His mission will be to deliver thirteen lectures nightly, without cessation. Each afternoon will be devoted to the general good of the cause, in which it is expected to more firmly cement together the grand phenomenal possibilities of our mediums, as a band of harmony, and thus move on the enemy with unbroken front. This movement looks forward to organization first, last and always. Among the many subjects handled by this speaker, will be the following:

Atheism, Orthodoxy and Spiritualism compared."

"Spiritualism, is it of God, is it of the Devil, or is it a humbug?"

"The Creation, the Origin of Man Upon this Planet; the Curse, and the banishment from the Garden of Eden."

"Books of the Church."

"The Curse of Cain, the Flood, Origin of Races."

"God as a Personality."

"Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."

"Bible Quotations."

"Joshua and the long day, and the Dial of Ahaz."

"Moses and the miraculous."

"Moses and the Exodus."

"Jesus Christ, the ninth Jewish God."

"Was Jesus Christ, God—one of a Trinity?"

This course of lectures will be delivered at Knights of Honor Hall, Third street, commencing Sunday evening, May 2. An introductory meeting will be held at 2 p. m., at which all Spiritualists of Dayton are requested to be present. The time has arrived when true Spiritualists must stand up and be counted, and go to work in earnest.

Hoping this may meet with the approval of all interested in a forward movement, I remain most respectfully an humble servant in the cause of Truth.

E. B. HELM.

Springfield and Columbus, please take note, as our spirit guide has already designated these two points as our next field of labor. All communications must be addressed to Henry A. Pugh, business manager, Dayton, Ohio.

LAKE PLEASANT, MASS.

We are rapidly completing the arrangements for the publishing of the camp-meeting circulars, and by the first of May they will be mailed to those who have written for them. The first week's meetings will be unusually interesting and attractive. On Sunday forenoon, August 1, President A. H. Dailey will formally open the convocation of 1897 with an address of welcome and will be followed by Mrs. T. U. Reynolds who has been engaged as test medium for the whole session. In the afternoon Dr. Chas. W. Hidden, of Newburyport, will occupy the platform.

During the whole session of thirty days, the services will be interspersed with music by the well known singers, the Ladies' Schubert Quartette of Boston. A feature which will be entirely new to any camp-meeting, and which will be peculiar to Lake Pleasant, will be a "Healing Festival." During the past year the daily papers all over the country have been teeming with accounts of the wonderful cures performed by Dr. C. W. Hidden, Mrs. Anna Lewis, Mr. George B. Sanborn, the Western Healer of Aspin, Col; Mr. Samuel A. Cheney, Mr. R. E. Fowler of Danbury, Conn., and Mrs. Alice Newell Hunt, a sister of the Blacksmith Healer Bradley Nuvell, of Vermont. These healers have been engaged and on the forenoons and afternoons of Monday and Tuesday, August 2d and 3d, a "Healing Festival" will be held in the Temple and all these healers will participate. Dr. Hidden will have charge of the arrangements and will also heal personally in conjunction with the others. Such a festival has never been attempted before and surcharged as our Temple is with spirit power, the conjunction of these powerful healers will undoubtedly result in some wonderful cures.

On Wednesday forenoon Dr. Hidden will deliver a medical lecture to ladies, and on Friday and Sunday following Professor Wm. M. Lockwood of Chicago, Mrs. T. U. Reynolds and Edgar W. Emerson will occupy the platform. The Fitchburg Military Band will give concerts daily.

Those who have sent me bids for the restaurant, boating privilege, newsstand, hotel, and baggage will receive answers as soon as the directors meet in May.

The families of Mr. A. C. Carey, Dwight Hillard, Mrs. Geo. Marble, Mr. C. L. Fisher, Thos. Gordon, C. E. Rice and Mrs. N. J. Morse are already at the Lake and Fred Haslam, and family and Mrs. M. J. Stewart will open their cottages this week.

It has been definitely decided that the Lyceum will be held each Sunday evening in the Temple, and that Russell's Orchestra will furnish the music for the march. On the last Sunday evening of August the Ladies' Improvement Society will co-operate with the Lyceum and will hold a memorial service in the Temple. On August 9, 10, and 11th the Ladies Improvement Society will hold its annual fair. We ask the many friends and members not to forget this occasion but to assist, as they have in the past, with as liberal donations of articles as possible. The society is always a friend in deed, as many of the less fortunate in this world's goods can testify, and those who assist can depend that they are working for a good cause. Anyone desiring information or circulars, can address, with stamp,

THE CAUSE IN AKRON, OHIO.

To the Editor:—Never before in the history of Akron has there been such a widespread and deep interest manifested in the cause of Modern Spiritualism, as there is at present.

The clergy have become thoroughly aroused, and actuated by the old spirit of religious intolerance and persecution, are doing all within their power to stop the growth of this popular truth, and prevent further depletion of their small congregations.

For the alleged purpose of exposing the phenomena of Spiritualism the orthodox clergymen throughout the city united in securing the services of an ex-minister and sleight-of-hand juggler, named Becker—the same man that Moses Hull met and defeated in a public debate in Dayton, Ohio.

From their several pulpits these learned divines commanded their followers to attend this so-called exposé, stating that Spiritualism was making such inroads into their congregations that measures must be taken to immediately check it.

Fully two thousand people attended the "exposure," but the tricks and sleight-of-hand performances were of such a low order that the better element of his audience were thoroughly disgusted, as was clearly discerned by their looks, and lack of enthusiasm.

As is usually the case the "Rev. Dr. Becker" only succeeded in advertising Spiritualism more thoroughly and we see a number of new faces at our meetings, since his fiasco.

The ladies of our association celebrated the Forty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, by giving a public supper and entertainment, and from every standpoint it was a decided success, the net profits averaging about $65.

Spiritualism is decidedly popular in Akron, and this gratifying change of public sentiment has been largely brought about by the earnest labor of Dr. F. Schermerhorn and his esteemed wife, who have been ministering to our spiritual needs since last August.

The clear, practical and scholarly lectures of the Doctor, in which the pure spiritual philosophy is promulgated, and the accuracy of his tests, in which names and messages are given, result in filling our G. A. R. hall (with a seating capacity of nearly four hundred) to overflowing every Sunday night, and a large portion of our audiences are just emerging from the orthodox churches. Nothing can stay the advance of our grand chariot of progress; all Oriental religions and mythical traditions must stand aside or be crushed under its massive wheels.

A pure inspiration and a modern revelation, are inscribed upon our banner, and with these we can overcome every obstacle that tends to retard the progress of Modern Spiritualism.

TEXAS SPIRITUALISTS, NOTICE.

The Executive Committee for a Mass Convention of Texas Spiritualists, recognizing the need of concerted action and organization of the Spiritualists of our State through a State Association consisting of representative delegates from all parts; and also knowing the great benefit to the cause by mass conventions as held in the North, do hereby issue a call to the associations and individuals of our belief to meet in Delegate and mass convention on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, May 1st, 2nd, and 3rd, at San Antonio, Texas.

All associations in the State are requested to appoint delegates to this Convention on a basis of one delegate for each society, and one to each twenty-five or major fraction thereof, and the Spiritualists of cities and towns unorganized are requested to appoint a delegate from amongst themselves and to furnish proper credentials.

LOYAL TO TRUTH.

SENSIBLE THOUGHTS CONCERNING FALSE TESTS AND GENUINE FAKES AND TRUE MEDIUMS.

To the Editor:—After a few days interval in Kansas City, we arrived in the little city of St. Joseph, Mo., and shall be here until the 15th of April, busy with Sunday lecture and week day sittings etc., continuing the work of our good Brother Geo. Brooks.

Spiritualism in St. Joseph has an uphill road to ascend, and many doubting Thomases remain in the background of seclusion, since the exposition of certain fraudulent parties who—well—infested the town with some flimsy trick-work which proved to be, not even a good sham.

"Oh ye of little faith!" What can ye see in the mirror of your own souls' reflection! Ye puny ones, who tremble at the maneuvers of the wary spider, who preys upon the public, that the public may prey upon it in its own web, in turn. Truth will prevail, and in futurity there hangs a ponderous scale—lest ye also be weighed in the balance, and found wanting, look well to your own stronghold, which should be ever pointing onward, toward dignity, sturdy defense of principle, and integrity.

With these in hand, we shall stand as men have ever stood, when sound of purpose and clean of heart, a bulwark against the petty encroachments suggested by erring hearts and dishonorable action. Throughout the South we found in many places the footprints in the sands, as it were, of many who, practicing imposition, had left a feeling of just indignation and disgust in the hearts of the people. However, the truths of Modern Spiritualism have been too clearly demonstrated, to be demolished by any knavery or fraud that could be imagined or devised, for no true Spiritualist at heart can be blinded to the Voice which has been aroused within his being, by any false practices, perpetrated by any individual, or number of individuals.

Remember, you people who have timidly and shrinkingly backslidden, because you may have witnessed the pitiful spectacle of some person presenting in fraudulent exhibitions, his or her own soul-perjury—remember it is not Spiritualism whose shining robes have been blackened—ah, no— can the gleam of a sunbeam be stained—nay, nor the golden Truths of Progression and Immortality stayed! The blot falls only on the soul of the mistaken one who perpetrates it, and its shadow on those few unstable minds who are as yet so blinded that they know not where they tread, with the searchlights of the eternal principles of Wisdom, Light, and Love just ahead.

Yes, fellow travelers, the "medium" in a certain line is hardly wanted in the South. If you are a hard-working, honest, reliable servant of the spirit-world, with your soul in the work and the love of humanity in your heart, you will find many an earnest ally, ready to maintain, assist, and aid you throughout your noble endeavors, and you will be enabled to reap the reward of conscious strength and encouragement, along the way; but if, on the other hand, you are one who seeks to find a way through the fortress of the hearts of the people, through the wounded and bleeding hearts of humanity, and when you come upon a Rachel mourning for her children, or for a father, brother, or other loved one, and you think to prey upon those throbbing human hearts, by playing upon the sacred emotions of love and affection, by sham communications from the angel world, and assumed personation, just be aware that you are liable to get a good ducking in the cold waters of repudiation, and be driven at last to fairly earn your right of way among honest men and women.

A coatsleeve, or pantaloons, covered with numerous vague messages, scrawled with indelible lead, may transfer a message very nicely to the wet corner of a handkerchief—certain persons do quite a profitable business in such actions to my personal knowledge—but as I said before, and as a certain slate-writer (?) declared lately, "The medium business is playing out." This party gave me a slate-writing (?) exhibition last month. "Can the spirits write a message?" he said, bringing three slates in and laying one down. With his thumb-nail, actually, my readers, I saw him slyly trace "Yes" on the back of the under slate. "Well," he said, "examine the slates, all sides," handing me the two. Said, done: "Now they may write a lot," said this producer of marks, hastily clapping the aside slate with its unviewed side enclosed. Then followed a series of muscle-contorting, after which he drew out triumphantly the latter slate, with a spray of painted flowers on it, and some sentences, applicable to any one on earth. It told "We are all here," glad I was progressing, etc. I had naughtily peeped at this preparation, while the medium (?) raised his hand to replace a fallen blind, inadvertently.

Now, Mr. Editor, and friends, I have witnessed genuine demonstrations, seen the fragment of pencil glide over, an uncovered slate and viewed other indisputable demonstration. I know that life is undestructible, that true and honest proof is within our reach, that the instinct of immortal life is inherent in the soul of man; and does the fact that one misguided underling takes me for one, and a fool in the bargain, swerve me for one moment, from standing, while breath lasts, for truth, loyalty, and spirituality? Verily the soul that can not stand firm in its own maintenance of integrity and honor is not the soul for the fighting of the good fight. Stand firm, ye halting ones; stand ever ready and gird armor, for "Truth crushed to earth, will rise again."

The Fifteenth Annual Camp-meeting of the Mississippi Valley Spiritualists' Association will be held at Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton Iowa, commencing Sunday, August 1, and closing Sunday, August 29, 1897.

The speakers engaged are Moses Hull, J. Frank Baxter, J. C. F. Grumbine and Mrs. Edith E. R. Nickless, with Mrs. George C. Cooley, of California, as test medium.

The circulars will be issued about May 1, and mediums intending to be present, who wish to be announced on these circulars, should communicate at once with me.

I desire to place advertising matter of the camp in the hands of every Spiritualist and investigator in the Mississippi Valley, and therefore ask that secretaries of societies will forward me at once a list of their members. I will be glad to return the favor by sending a list of those whom I know, should these societies at any time ask for same.

Every Spiritualist in the Mississippi Valley is or ought to be interested in the success of our camp-meeting and to all I say that your co-operation will be appreciated. All letters of inquiry will be promptly answered, and information cheerfully given by addressing me at Fulton, Ill., till further notice.

"Living is an art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the arts."—THOMAS STARR KING.

This book gives an admirable course of study in ethics, and supplies a long-felt want of an ethical text-book especially adapted to the comprehension of children, as well as older persons whom it is wisely and appropriately designed to interest while teaching them valuable ethical lessons.

The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principles of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in children's lyceums. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. It is a most excellent book and should be widely circulated.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

JESUS AND THE MEDIUMS,

CHRIST AND MEDIUMSHIP.

Careful comparison of some of the Spiritualism and Mediumship of the Bible with that of to-day. By MOSES HULL. An invincible argument proving that Jesus was only a medium, subject to all the conditions of modern mediumship. It also shows that all the manifestations throughout the Old and New Testament were under the same conditions that mediums require to-day; and that the coming of Christ is the return of mediumship to the world. 48 pages. Woman, Church and State.

A Historical Account of the Status of Woman Through the Christian Ages, with Reminiscences of the Matriarchate.

BY MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE

THE AMOUNT OF VALUABLE INformation succinctly and clearly stated in this volume of 554 pages is amazing. The title, as above given, fails to convey an idea of the fullness and completeness with which the subjects are treated. The Matriarchate, or Mother-rule, is the theme of the first chapter, in which much lore, quaint, queer and curious, is brought to view in elucidation of the subject. This is followed by chapters on Celibacy, Canon Law, Marquette, Witchcraft, Wives, Polygamy, Woman and Work, The Church of To-day, Past, Present, Future; and there is not a chapter in the book that is not handled in a masterly manner, and that for quantity and quality of information, is not worth the full price of the volume. It is packed with knowledge well-arranged, and intensely interesting from beginning to end. No one can possibly regret buying it; it is a valuable addition to the library of any free and truth-loving mind.

IMMORTALITY,
. . . OR . . .
FUTURE HOMES AND DWELLING PLACES.

BY DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

AN INVALUABLE WORK!

This admirable work contains what a hundred spirits, good and evil, say of their dwelling-places. Give us details—details and accurate delineations of life in the Spirit-world!—is the constant appeal of thoughtful minds. Death is approaching. Whither—oh, whither! Shall I know my friends beyond the tomb? Will they know me? What is their present condition, and what their occupations? In this volume the spirits, differing as they may, are allowed to speak for themselves. No man is better qualified than Dr. Peebles to place a work of this kind before the people. He treats of the Mysteries of Life; Doubts and Hopes; The Bridging of the River; Foregleams of the Future; Testimony of Saints; The Growth and Perfection of the Spiritual Body; Is it the Soul or Body that Sins?; Clothing in the Spirit-world; Our Little Ones in Heaven; The Personal Experiences of Aaron Knight; The Red Man's Testimony; Evil Spirits; Testimony of Physicians in Spirit-Life; The Homes of Apostles and Divines; The Friends and Shakers in Spirit-Life; Spirit Homes of Bruno and Others; Many Voices from the Spirit-Land. Many other matters are treated, too numerous to mention. Price $1.50; postage, 12 cents. For sale at this office.
